"LITTLE JINNY."

The Pathetic History of a Woman's Stormy Life.

We were snow-bound on the Northern Pacific. The first day was spent in making complaints against the weather, in asking foolish questions of the conductor, in idle guesses as to how long we would be delayed, varied with expressions of contempt for the foolhardiness that had led us to attempt such a journey at such a time of year over such a road.

The second day we resigned ourselves to the situation with something more of grace, and from making the hours a burden turned our attention to lightening their tediousness. [illegible] we found out that our party of storm-stayed travelers possessed a wealth of resources. Songs were sung, poems recited and stories told. The elocutionist rolled his eyes and his r's for the entertainment of his appreciative audience, the conundrum fiend rose to the occasion. Among the stories told I remember best the following one, which I give as nearly as possible in the language of the narrator:

"I haven't thought of little Jinny in many a day, but there's a pair of eyes in this car that are as like what hers used to be as ever I saw one pair of eyes like another, and I've been haunted all day by a memory. In the first place she had a miserable, drunken, brutal wretch for a father. She was half-starved and half-clothed all her life. The only things that she had plenty of were blows and curses, and old Temple was free as air with these. There never was a time when she didn't have them on hand and to spare, but if they'd cost a cent Jinny wouldn't have known the sound of them.

"That sort of treatment doesn't have a sanctifying effect, and it's more than likely that Jinny was rather wild; women folks said so, and though I don't take much stock in what women say of each other, it may be they were right in this; why not? The poor child's mother died when she was born. It was said that the mother was a very sweet, gentle little woman—and in those early wild days it was every man and every woman for themselves—and in this case there was no one to help, but many to hurt.

"But, anyway, when Jinny was about sixteen she ran off with Dick Thorne—and a thorn he was, and no mistake. If there ever was a man meaner than the evil one, he was the man. He was a coarse, rough fellow, unattractive in every way. She never cared much for him, but I suppose she thought life couldn't be much worse than it was, and here was a chance, if a small one, of something better; so she took it. Some folks seem born with a faculty of running on to snags, and Jinny was one of these. She found before long that she'd gone from bad to worse.

"Pretty? Yes, she was as pretty as a picture; blue eyes, like that bit of sky up there—only they had something in them that the sky lacks; hair the color of gold, that waved and fluffed around her pretty white forehead; a complexion like a blush rose, and, though sin and iniquity had been her food and drink, as one might say, she had an expression like that I've seen in the faces of pictured saints. It happens sometimes, you know; there's no sign on the white face of the water-lily of the mud and slime it came up out of, and often so it is with human-kind.

"Well, she had a dog's life of it with Thorne; there was no kind of meanness that he did not have a hand in, and that he did not try to drag her into, but she clung to him because he was her husband, and if she left him she knew just about where she'd go. She knew what temptations stood waiting for such as she; always waiting; and poor and ignorant and abused as she was, she had a leaning toward decency and made a brave fight for it.

"But after all?

"Yes, after all she went under; that is, she ran away from him, just as she ought to have done long before, and then another devil of a different pattern stood in her path; a nice, smooth-tongued, handsome devil, with smiling eyes and lying lips and a black heart and money in his pocket.

"It's a curious thing, but in different people meanness shows in different ways. Thorne abused her because he was mean and selfish, and her father likewise, and Elliott Gray was good to her for the same reason. It pleased him to see her look pretty, so he bought her silks and laces and diamonds. How she loved him; he was the first man she ever loved with all her heart and soul and brain, and he was doubly loved, for he loved himself first, last and all the time.

"I don't know but if a man's got to be mean that the smiling, pleasant-mannered ones are no better than the rough, swearing sort. If a woman's got to have her heart broken she is certainly a little better off not to have her head broken at the same time, and I do know that all the happiness that little Jinny ever had that black-hearted liar gave her.

"Of course he got tired of her, and equally, of course, she didn't get tired of him. You see some men require a woman to love him just when and how and as much as he wants and no more, and the foolish creatures don't seem to understand; they seem to think that they can't love a man to the very extent of his asking without loving him too well to stop short whenever he says so; and Jinny was that unreasonable that she kept on caring for Elliott when there was every reason that she should hate him instead. He got on the downgrade and kept going. They went here and there; they were in Denver for awhile; her fine clothes went for bread and shelter and to keep him out of the hands of the law. Then one day I saw him on the street in Deadwood. His clothes were sort o' shabby genteel, but he wore a silk hat and his boots shone so you could have seen your face in them, and he carried a cane. He had the same hard, cruel look on his mouth—you may talk about reading a man by his eyes, but there's no feature like the mouth for telling what a man is in heart and life—the same smile, that had no more warmth in it than there is in the glitter of a razor. He didn't know me, but it was part of my business in those days to remember faces, and I remembered his.

"A few days after that I had been out in the country looking after a thief that had escaped us, and was driving into town when I saw something in the road a little way ahead, and a queer outfit it appeared to be. As I drew near I saw it was a woman. She had tied one corner of a faded summer shawl to an old satchel and was dragging the load along on the ground. She was so tired that she fairly staggered. It was plain that she had no business to be walking along that dry, hard highway under that broiling sun. So I reined up and said: 'Wouldn't you like to ride?' When she looked up and said, 'Yes, if you please,' I saw that it was little Jinny, faded and worn, and so tired-looking. She recognized me at once, and immediately asked me if I had seen Elliott. She said he had left her in a town about one hundred miles from Deadwood, and she had come part of the way on the cars, and after her money gave out she had walked, carrying the old satchel in her hands till she could carry it no longer, then she dragged it, as I've said. She was footsore, dusty and hungry, but all this seemed forgotten in her one desire to find Elliott Gray.

"I had known her when she was a little girl and when she was living with her husband, Thorne, and I had no feeling but pity for her; and when she said: 'I don't know as he will be glad to see me, but I want to be with him—now,' I could have cried for her, and I could have choked the breath out of the miserable hound that had deserted her and for whom she hadn't a single word of blame.

"She found him. I saw them on the street one evening a week after. A month later, as I was passing a tumble-down tenement in a wretched quarter of the town, I heard a woman's voice crying out: 'Oh, don't for God's sake, don't!' I rushed up the stairs; the officer on that beat was there as soon as I, and there, in a poor, bare room, was little Jinny and Elliott Gray. She was hugging a baby in her arms—a dead baby—black in the face, with purple finger-marks around its tiny throat. It had been choked to death. When the officer would have put Gray under arrest little Jinny cried out: 'Oh, no! I killed the baby; I did indeed. Tell them, Elliott, that I did it.'

"Gray said: 'You see, gentlemen, the infant was quite worn out, and so—'

"'Yes, yes, that was it,' cried the mother; 'it fretted and fretted and I couldn't stand it any longer, and my head felt so bad, and—and—I choked the poor thing to death. Didn't I, Elliott?'

"I looked in Gray's face and said: 'Did the mother of this baby kill it?' He looked me as straight in the eyes as an honest man would have done, and said: 'Yes, poor Jinny.'

"A man who had come in quietly and had been bending over the baby—they had taken it out of Jinny's arms—looked up and said: 'The man lies, and I'm afraid the woman lies too. She did not kill the baby. Those marks are the marks of a man's fingers—not her little ones. Look there,' and we looked and there they were; big marks of a man's thick, flat fingers. Jinny had the thinest hand with fingers like pipe-stems. The doctor—for he was a physician from the hospital—said: 'These marks tell the truth, and I say'—and he turned his searching eyes straight on Gray—'that you killed this child; your murderous hand choked the life out of it, and you dare not deny it.'

"Gray was a coward, a weak, miserable coward, as all liars are. The marks of his own hands condemned him; there was no need for him to admit any thing; his ashy face and trembling limbs were enough. He made no resistance, and as they took him away poor Jinny threw her arms around him, crying: 'Oh, no, no, no! I did it. Take me and let him go.'

"Well, they took him to jail. Jinny went into a raving brain fever and died. There's nothing else, you know, for such as she to do. The world will let a man do all manner of wickedness and forgive him, but the grave is the only place for the woman who goes wrong.

"'Houses of refuge and such.' Yes, I know, and the women come out labeled for life. Men don't go round with a tag on them to tell their sins. A precious sight of trouble 'twould be if they did. And another curious thing is that the world will be generous enough to a woman after she is dead, but let her presume to live and there's small chance for her. A sister of Charity took care of little Jinny till she died. The sister told me that she raved about the baby and Elliott, and kept praying the good Lord to forgive him, not lay it up against him. Once she looked up in the sister's face, saying: 'Don't it tell somewhere something about the people that love much being forgiven much? Seems to me I've heard that.' The sister told her yes; then she smiled, and said: 'It's all right, then, for God knows.'

"So she died and went to the God who sees things as they are. No woman came near her; some sentimental idiot did send a wreath of rosebuds to lay on her cheap coffin. I doubt if a good woman had ever put a flower in her hand during all her hard, sad life. Perhaps she might have been different if she had known something of the sweetness and beauty of love and tenderness. Who knows? Men are a bad lot enough, but they surely go dead against each other; and, in spite of soft words, houses of refuge, and roses on a coffin, when it comes to real, honest, rock-bottom charity—the charity that asks no questions and imposes no obligations; that does not fasten a mortgage on its recipient, but sees only the suffering and the need, why, I say that, on the subject of that charity, women have much to learn.

"I don't know what finally became of Gray. He was put in jail; but, when it was known for a fact that he actually tried to make the woman suffer for the crime he committed—well, those were wild, rough days, my friends, and one night, when I was out of town, he disappeared, and I don't know what became of him. There didn't a man in town know where he went; not a man. Only the good God knows."—Chicago Times.

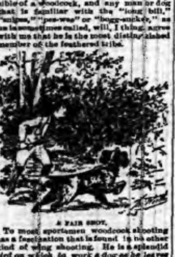
WOODCOCK HUNTING.

Where they are Found and How to Kill Them

Why Summer Shooting Should Be Prohibited—What Kind of Dog to Use—Some Interesting Characteristics of the Bird

COPYRIGHT 1889.

If I were asked to describe a game bird, I would give as close a description as possible of a woodcock, and any man or dog that is familiar with the "long bill," "snipe," "pee-wee" or "bogg-sucker," as he is sometimes called, will, I think, agree with me that he is the most distinguished member of the feathered tribe.



A FAIR SHOT.

To most sportsmen woodcock shooting has a fascination that is found in no other kind of wing shooting. He is a splendid bird on which to work a dog as he leaves a strong scent, seldom runs while the dog is pointing, and lies so close that it is often necessary for the gunner to walk in ahead of his dog to flush him.

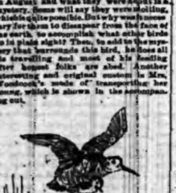
He apparently makes no friends, even among his own tribe, and just as soon as he is old enough to grub for himself he lives a life independent of his family. It is seldom that two birds are put up together, and when such is the case it will be noticed that their flights are in opposite directions rather than the same.

His bill, which is conspicuous for its length, answers the combined purpose of drill and tweezers. With this instrument the woodcock probes away down in the soft soil in quest of worms. The end of this horny drill is a centre of nerves and so sensitive as to enable him to tell the instant it comes in contact with a worm, when "Presto!" the drill has changed into a pair of tweezers whose grasp marks the end of the wriggler's earthly career.

It is claimed, and by good authority, that a woodcock will devour twice his weight in worms at a single repast. One would hardly imagine that his capacity was equal to this, as he is the owner of but one intestine.

As a table delicacy they rank foremost, and, differing from other game birds, are the finest eating when cooked soon after being killed. They are placed before the consumer still decorated by the long billed head.

A glance at the woodcock will show that he has an unusually high forehead, and when you become cognizant of his peculiar ways, you will have convincing proof that he knows how to use it. There are a number of unsolved problems regarding his habits. For instance, there may be an abundance of birds in the month of July. The arrival of August will disclose the fact that every one has disappeared, and just as suddenly they reappear in September, and are found in the corn fields bordering a stream where the soil is rich and soft. Now, where they were in August and what they were about is a mystery. Some will say they were moulting, which is quite possible. But why was it necessary for them to disappear from the face of the earth to accomplish what other birds do in plain sight? Then, to add to the mystery that surrounds this bird, he does all his travelling and most of his feeding after honest folks are abed. Another interesting and original custom is Mrs. Woodcock's mode of transporting her young, which is shown in the accompanying cut.



MRS. WOODCOCK TRANSPORTING HER YOUNG.

The degree of skill attained by the experienced woodcock hunter is astonishing, and to the novice is almost beyond belief. This bird, on jumping up, will invariably make a nearly perpendicular ascent and disappear over the top of the brush. It is unnecessary for his flight to be visible but for a few feet, as it is only his direction that is required; and he may be well out of sight before the report of the gun, but the chances are about seven out of ten that a few of the shot will succeed in penetrating the foliage and bringing him down.

The mistake an amateur makes is that of shooting to quickly. He realizes that the bird will be almost immediately out of sight and thinks he must fire before the meteor like target has disappeared. This is all wrong. For even if he succeeds in killing his bird by this method, it will be at such close quarters that nothing but a few feathers will remain for his game bag.

In hunting woodcock, a staunch dog is required, and he should be trained especially for this kind of sport. It is essential that he should be a close ranger, otherwise most of the time he would be out of sight in the thick brush, willows or alders, for such are the places that woodcock frequent. He must also be a thoroughly good retriever, for without a persistent retriever nine tenths of the dead birds would be lost. Even then, a number of birds will be left hanging in the top of the brush.

Woodcock shooting may be divided into two kinds, summer and fall shooting.

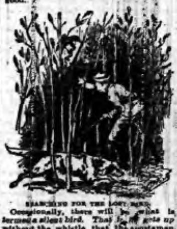
In the hot days of the former, he is found in the most romantic and picturesque spots, such as along the cool and shady banks of a stream or lake, where he remains all day long under the protection of a spreading brake or overhanging willow. At this season he is mentally and physically but partially developed, and against a staunch dog and fairly good shot hasn't a ghost of a chance. He gets up on weak wings and is such a chump that if fired at and missed his flight will measure but a few yards, when he will drop in most any spot, whether conspicuous or not, and quietly wait to be kicked up and shot at again. This kind of thing will go on indefinitely until the "shoemaker"—for shoemaker he is—a sportsman would have downed him with the first or second shot, has either killed him by a lucky chance or, as is often the case, left in disgust, swearing that woodcock shooting is no good, anyway.

For this early shooting a light, 28 inch barrelled, 12 gauge, cylinder bore gun is preferable. The shells should be tightly reamed and loaded with 3¼ drams of quick powder and 1 oz. of No. 10 chilled shot with two wads over the powder and one over the shot, using wood powder, which is smokeless, in the barrel that is first fired.

Most of the birds will be killed at very short range, and the result striven for is that the shot be evenly scattered over as much territory as possible, for one or two of these small shot would be sufficient to kill the young bird.

Where twenty birds could be found some fifteen years ago, there is but one now. And this pitiable state of affairs is mainly due to the killing of young birds. Luckily, there are but few States at present whose game laws do not protect woodcock in the summer months. The sooner they all have strict laws against the "Slaughter of the Innocents"—for innocents they are until the latter part of August—the better it will please any true sportsman.

Now comes the fall shooting, when No. 8 shot should be substituted for the No. 10, and every woodcock killed will be worth two of the July birds. Proportionately to the bird's increase in size, is his growth in worldly wisdom. And if he is not brought down at the first shot the chances are he will make a long flight and if not killed on the second rise he is off for good.



SEARCHING FOR THE LOST BIRD.

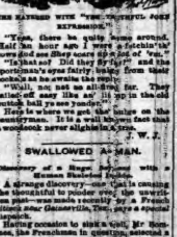
Occasionally, there will be what is termed a silent bird. That is, he gets up without the whistle that the sportsman expects to hear, and his flight is so rapid that he is nearly out of range before the gunner has realized that it is a woodcock at all.

The birds begin working South with the first heavy frost, and when the full moon comes they travel very rapidly. The greatest trouble is found in striking the flight. For instance, a good piece of fall ground may be hunted very carefully to-day and not a bird put up. To-morrow morning you may hunt that same cover and kill fifteen or twenty birds on it, all of which dropped in during the night. If not disturbed they might have remained there a few days. But if there were a heavy frost, the chances are they would have left during the following night.

The favorite ground for droppers, as the flight birds are called, is second growth timber, especially silver poplars that are situated on high ground; near a swamp or stream. If the nights are very cold the birds will be found under second growth, hemlocks or pines. Every locality, however, has its favorite woodcock grounds, where the birds are sure to drop, and other covers that look all right that never hold a bird.

As sportsmen know to their cost, the innocent looking hayseed wearing a truthful John expression always tells a lie when asked if he has "seen any woodcock this season?"

As is often the case, he does not even know what a woodcock is, nevertheless his answer comes without the slightest hesitation.



THE HAYSEED WITH "THE TRUTHFUL JOHN EXPRESSION."

"Yes, there be quite some around. Half an hour ago I were a-fetchin' th' cows and see Shep scare up a lot of 'em."

"Is that so? Did they fly far?" and the sportsman's eyes fairly bulge from their sockets as he awaits the reply.

"Well, no; not so all-fired far. They sailed off easy like an' lit up in the old button ball ye see yonder."

Here is where we get the bulge on the countryman. It is a well known fact that a woodcock never alights in a tree.

SWALLOWED A MAN.

Discovery of a Huge Serpent with a Human Skeleton Inside.

A strange discovery—one that is causing the thoughtful to ponder over the unwritten past—was made recently by a French citizen near Gainesville, Tex., says a special dispatch.

Having occasion to sink a well, Mr Bommes, the Frenchman in question, selected a spot in a valley near a range of great length, and which, during heavy rains, is transformed into a raging torrent, depositing in the valley limestone, gravel, mud and other debris.

After reaching a depth of four feet, and while in a formation of limestone gravel that had continued almost uninterruptedly from the surface down, Mr. Bommes came upon the vertebræ and ribs of an animal. The ribs were about the size of a small pig's and rapidly tapered.

Carefully unearthing the bones toward the tapering end, Mr. Bommes came to the rattles, which, when counted, numbered seventeen, the largest measuring six inches across. Attracted by the strange find the neighbors gathered in and the work of unearthing the monster was prosecuted with vigor.

After laying bare nineteen feet of the remains of the monster [illegible], imagine their consternation at finding the entire skeleton of a man of tremendous stature in the stomach of the skeleton of the snake.

The remains of the man and the serpent, as far as the serpent has been exhumed, are as perfect as when first deposited, [illegible] and were doubtless covered by lime and gravel soon after death.

Near the bones of the man's right hand is a wide stone hatchet, which a local geologist of some repute reports to be similar to the handiwork of paleolithic man.

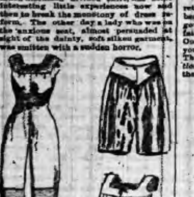
HER UNIQUE WARDROBE.

The Theories and Practice of Mrs. Jenness Miller

Making Women Comfortable and Beautiful By Improving Their Clothes—The Pretty Gowns of the Famous Dress Reformer—How to Be Healthy.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

Mrs. Jenness Miller, who says that more than 100,000 women have adopted her much discussed divided skirt, has some interesting little experiences now and then to break the monotony of dress reform. The other day a lady who was on the anxious seat, almost persuaded at sight of the dainty, soft silken garment, was smitten with a sudden horror.



THE JENNESS-MILLER UNDERWEAR.

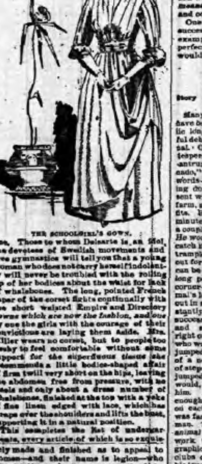
"It's very pretty and all that and no doubt very comfortable, but suppose I should be killed in a railroad accident and found with it on?"

"Well, madame," came the answer, "I doubt if legiettes would bar your passage to heaven."

One point which many women seem unable to comprehend is how these same legiettes are donned. "Do they go over the head?" is what they are all asking. No, madame, they do not go over the head after the fashion of women's ordinary garments; you could not put them over your head to save you. More than that, they do not button on. All the early dress reform systems buttoned, and many a worthy soul bent on attiring herself strictly in accord with hygienic principles has grown so weary of buttoning. Is there absolutely no petticoat, is another query; is there no substitute for the corset being an anxiously propounded third.

There is no petticoat in Mrs. Miller's wardrobe which is probably the most unique in America. Instead of the usual clothing of femininity, the tall and supple figure covers itself with a closely woven "union suit" of flesh colored silk which fits the person from the neck to the ankles as perfectly and almost as closely as the tights of the ballet dancer. It is all in one piece, and reduces the size and bulk by doing away with the gathers and bands and fitting everything without a wrinkle to the natural shape. Over this comes the "chemilette" of black surah or a delicate pink or the palest possible shade of green, with dainty briar-stitched hems and an edging of lace drawn up on baby ribbons about the shoulders. Like the union suit this is a combination garment doing duty for three articles of attire commonly worn by women. There remain the "Turkish legiettes," the objects of universal curiosity, the "unwomanly," the "perfectly lovely," the substitute for the petticoat which many women of wealth and fashion are following Mrs. Miller in adopting. To the eye a little straight skirt of surah, of a shade to match the pretty things in silk that went before, gathered into a five-inch, V-shaped yoke at the waist, and finished with more of the fairylike briarstitching. It wont go on over the head for all its apparent simple innocence, though the division into very wide trousers, without slope or slant in the seam, is concealed, save in the act of walking, by the fulness. This divided petticoat leaves the limb motion unhampered, and in wet weather there is no soiling or draggling. Black or fawn colored silk stockings fastened below the knee by garters of coiled silver wire, low-heeled and wide-toed shoes complete the tout ensemble of ease in which, as one newly indoctrinated convert put it, she could turn a summersault in a party dress over three elephants without bursting a thread.

And the corset? It is really a fact worth noting that the number of girls is constantly on the increase who go without one. Those to whom Delsarte is an idol, the devotees of Swedish movements and free gymnastics will tell you that a young woman who does not carry herself indolently will never be troubled with the rolling up of her bodices about the waist for lack of whalebones. The long, pointed French taper of the corset fights continually with the short waisted Empire and Directory gowns which are now the fashion, and one by one the girls with the courage of their convictions are laying them aside. Mrs. Miller wears no corset, but to people too fleshy to feel comfortable without some support for the superfluous tissue she recommends a little bodice-shaped affair of firm twill very short on the hips, leaving the abdomen free from pressure, with no steels and only about a dozen number of whalebones, finished at the top with a yoke of fine linen edged with lace, which has straps over the shoulders and lifts the bust, supporting it in a natural position.



THE SCHOOLGIRL'S GOWN.

This completes the list of undergarments, every article of which is so exquisitely made and finished as to appeal to women—and their name is legion—who love pretty underwear even better than costly outside clothes. Every dress Mrs. Miller wears, whether for summer or winter, street or house, is made, without exception, on the same foundation, called the "dress form," which is really a silk lining cut a la princesse, sleeveless, decollete; or it might be called a carefully fitted waist extending into a princesse skirt, on which the goods of the dress are arranged to produce the effect of basque, jacket or belt, the sashed Empire or the coattailed Directoire style. It sounds as if variety would be wanting, but the number of combinations is as unlimited as are the possibilities of the ordinary fashionable gown.

Mrs. Miller's toilets are becoming famous and attract much attention as she drives through the leafy avenues of the park this summer. A dainty girlish gown, recently finished, is of a delicate shade of old pink India silk, soft and falling into wonderfully opposite lines. The princesse gown form is faced nearly to the waist line to form the underskirt. The bodice is laid in loose folds from either shoulder, leaving a modest V open at the full beautiful throat where filmy meshes of costly lace are projected on the skin. Below the bust the silk is fastened to the gown form and the long clinging drapery is shirred on over it, producing the effect of a belt about five inches wide, but really forming a gown all in one piece without belt or band. The full sleeves cover the round arms to the elbows where wide frills of the lace are set in. No bustle is worn, not even a reed or a hoop holds the soft folds of the skirt in position, the shimmering summery material outlining the lithe figure in long continuous curves. Made of cashmere or serge or camel's hair, close at the throat and long sleeved it is almost exactly the gown which the girl student at Oberlin and one or two other colleges admitting women have adopted from Mrs. Miller as a study costume and which they call the "school girls' Josephine robe." In it the priestess of dress looks like a young brunette graduate.

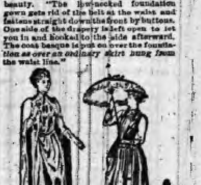
"How do you get into such a dress as that?" asks a young neophyte, no opening or suggestion of an opening being visible.

"It is the simplest thing in the world," returns the crusader in quest of health and beauty. "The low-necked foundation gown gets rid of the belt at the waist and fastens straight down the front by buttons. One side of the drapery is left open to let you in and hooked to the side afterward. The coat basque is put on over the foundation as over an ordinary skirt hung from the waist line."



FOR HOUSE AND STREET WEAR.

A pretty house dress is of silk and cloth in two shades of mauve. The outside coat, with its long, hanging, square-cornered sleeves, with their touch of Oriental mysticism, is of cloth, the drapery of surah merveilleux. The linings and facings are of twig green. The rich hand embroidery is in shades of pink and green. There is a soft sash of twig green surah and the deep fringe which edges the sleeves is of sewing silk in all the shades of the gown. Cut as it is in strict conformity with all the principles of rational dress, it is in no way grotesque or unusual, and in outward appearance differs but little, save in the exquisiteness of the coloring, in which Mrs. Miller is an artist, from the best of the fashionable models of the day.

"How do you get your dresses made, Mrs. Miller?"

"I put them in the hands of a French modiste, who is not a dress reformer by any means. Most of her other work is for people of fashion, but she is of sufficiently liberal mind to be willing to carry out my ideas."

"Do you believe in the success of your dress reform movement?"

"Believe in it? I can see it succeed. There are 'dress clubs' composed of women pledged to clothe themselves rationally springing up all over the country. Chicago has one and so has St. Louis and Battle Creek and Oxford, Ind., and more places than I could stop to name. More than 100,000 people are wearing the legiettes and among them are women of wealth and society leaders in New York, Boston, Washington and Chicago. There is Mrs. Rockefeller, the wife of the Standard Oil millionaire, and —but I ought not to mention names, I am afraid the ladies might object to the publicity. I have a special dress which I designed for W. C. T. U. workers, and Mrs. Mary A. Livermore is arranging a campaign for me in Boston in the fall."

"All your dresses are of fine materials which drape easily. Would the gowns be successful in the coarser stuffs which a majority of people must wear?"

"If the majority of people would drop cheap trimmings there would be more fine materials used. It is one of the artistic principles of dress to get little, if need be, but let what you have be good and genuine. Many poor women spend more money on tawdry goods than would keep them in nice clothes, because the cheap things must be so much oftener renewed. Yes, an artistic gown is more beautiful in dainty stuffs, but it must be more satisfactory in any material than one which is inartistic."

"In what material could the average woman have the underwear?"

"The woman who can't afford wash silk or pongee underclothes and can't run up a bill of $165 for them as a lady whom I know did the other day, can make the combination suits of just the same materials she is wearing now, merino next the person, or lisle thread, or in winter pure wool. For the second garment she can use cotton, cambric, linen or chambray. The legiettes can be made of cotton or of any light weight flannel or camel's hair or cashmere or lady's cloth. There is no reason why any woman, however limited her means should not make herself healthy and comfortable."

One very evident reason for Mrs. Miller's success lies in the fact that she is a fine example of the results of physical culture, perfectly healthy and supple. Any reform would go which could produce such women.

ELLEN OSBORN.

CANADA'S VIOLENCE.

Story of an American Circus Elephant Famous for His Mad Fits.

Many interesting and famous elephants have been favorites of the American public long before the late Jumbo's successful debut, says a writer in Chambers' Journal. One of these, known as Canada, was a desperate character. When in one of his tantrums "he did as much mischief as a tornado," to use the American showman's words—tossing hacks into the air and tearing down signs and lamp-posts. He was sent with the rest of the menagerie to a farm, and when there had one of his mad fits. Rushing into the stable-yard, in a few minutes he killed two buffaloes, a sacred cow, a couple of elks, several horses and a camel. He would seize an animal, toss it in the air, catch it on its tusks, and then either jam or trample the life out of it. He then sallied out for town, and the popular excitement can be imagined. A trap was set with a long ponderous chain with an enormous corner-stone at its end to entangle the animal's legs and hold him. A man then ran out in sight of Canada, and the elephant instantly rushed after him. The trap was successful as far as making the chain and stone fast to him, but he kept right on, and would have caught the man, who was a fast runner, had not the latter jumped down into an unfinished cellar of a new house and ran up a narrow flight of steps on the opposite side. The elephant jumped down after him as easily as a dog would, with the big stone clattering after him. Fortunately, the stone was large enough to stick, wedged against the walls on each side of the stairway, and Canada was fast, but it was a close shave for the man. They managed to secure the savage animal with more chains, and then went to work to conquer him. As the account graphically describes it, "they wore out bag clubs on him, fired loads of buckshot into his trunk and ears, and beat and tortured him for hours until he howled in token of surrender." The moment he was loose, however, he gave a yell of rage, dashed out of the cellar and started to kill. Every one flew for his life, but he was tired and took up his position under cover of three haystacks, hunting all who ventured near him. Buckshot fired into his head only checked his wild rushes, and whenever he thought people were on the other side of the stack from him he tried his best to topple the hay over on them. The fight went on for three days and nights, during which time he had not a bite to eat—for he was too angry even to take any of the hay around him—and not a drop of water. At length, despairing of saving him, the shotguns were exchanged for heavy rifles, and several big bullets at close range finally put an end to him.

Duration of Nerve Life.

It has been estimated that we get a complete new outfit of brains every two months. The duration of a nerve's life is about sixty days. Each nerve cell has its own independent function, subordinate to the higher functions of the whole brain "en masse;" and the latter acts as a sort of boss or overseer to the individual actions and life of each separate cell. Every cell is destroyed and renewed every two months, so we each get six brand new brains per year!

Nothing New.

Adorer (nervously)—"Isn't that your father's step on the stairs?"

Sweet Girl—"Yes, but don't mind that. It's only a scare. He won't come down. He always stamps around that way when I sit up with young men after eleven o'clock."

A CAUSE OF DISASTER.

The recent failure of a New England shoe manufacturing firm, after many years of active and apparently successful business existence, created much astonishment.

Yet it was naught but a repetition of an old story of financial reverses [illegible] caused by reckless and imprudent speculation.

The same old story of trying to augment wealth by leaving the safe and solid ground of legitimate business industry and enterprise to accomplish shipwreck upon the treacherous sea of speculation.

That tells the tale of a vast proportion of business failures throughout the country. A mania for endeavoring to make money by reckless chance, instead of keeping steadily along the pathway of practical business knowledge, is to court disaster and ruin.

Bankrupt history proves the truth of that.

The present is a fast age, entirely too fast for honest effort and permanent prosperity.

Some may declare such a sentiment [illegible] to fogyism, but it is nevertheless an unvarnished fact.

High pressure is the fashion of the day and scattering explosions are the natural result.

The system is modern, we admit, but unsound and evil-boding we unhesitatingly assert.

National wealth was never more substantial, and the people of the United States, of all classes and conditions, never so reliably well off, as when trade, commerce and industrial pursuits were free from mercenary machinations, and carried on with practical intelligence and economy and in strict accordance with the natural laws of production and disposal.

Then small tradesmen, manufacturers, artisans and producers had the same secure opportunity to live and prosper as the larger, and were content with moderate, but honestly acquired incomes.

Then each man followed the calling whereof he was master, there being no gambling temptation to lead him astray, no venal statutes to molest, and then consumers were happily exempt from robber bands of extortionists.

Those were the halcyon days of personal rights and freedom, before vicious Trusts, Monopolists and Speculators had arisen to demoralize, pillage and lay waste.

Blessed would it be for the American people as a whole, not a selfish part, could those times be measurably reestablished.

A Barn Destroyed by Lightning.

During the heavy shower between seven and eight o'clock Saturday morning, lightning struck a large barn on a road between El Mora and Roselle. Instantly the flames burst from the roof, and the building was destroyed. The barn was some distance from the Central Railroad, but the occurrence was witnessed by the passengers of a passing train. The barn was the property of Mr. Kipling.

How the [illegible] Up the "[illegible] City."

The feeling of indignation against the [illegible] seen by those who have already commenced the building of apartment houses in this city, has become very intense.

The effect of the publication in other papers of reports from the near-by to the effect that Plainfield is "torn through the heart" and is now "only a dishevelled likeness of its former self," will be to drive away any who were, or might have been, coming to this city to live.

Death of Mr. Peter Keufling.

The sad announcement is made today of the death of Peter, son of William and Henrietta Keufling, which occurred at the parents' residence, in North Plainfield, Monday, from consumption. The deceased was in the twenty-first year of his age, and had been ailing for a long time. A brother of the deceased was lying in the same room suffering from the same complaint, and nearing the end, when the angel of death entered the bed chamber and called one of the brothers to his long home. The other one will doubtless soon follow.

Township Committee Meeting.

A special meeting of the North Plainfield Township Committee was held Monday night, with President Coddington in the chair. All the members were present. About the only important business transacted was the adoption of a resolution authorizing the expenditure of $3,000 for repairs to the roads which suffered by the late flood.

Under a new law the Township Committee has the power to raise money for similar purposes without calling a special election to have the voters decide upon the amount. The money will be borrowed on three notes of $1,000 each, payable annually, the first note to mature in 1890.

Now We Know We're Safe.

To the Honorable Common Council of the City of Plainfield.

Since the late freshet, Mr. Isaac W. Pangborn, master mason and builder, and myself, have made a careful personal examination of the dam, known as the "Vail dam," at Feltville, and we became entirely satisfied that at present there is not the slightest danger to be apprehended from that source.

This communication is submitted to your honorable body in justice to Mr. Warren Ackerman, the owner of the dam, who has done all that could be demanded during the exciting period of alarm through which we have just passed, and further, in order that the public may know that there is no present cause for alarm.

Respectfully submitted,
ISAAC W. PANGBORN,

[illegible] COUNCIL MEETING.

When President Dumont called the Common Council to order in its regular meeting, Monday, there were present besides himself Councilmen Dunham, [illegible], Jenkins, Marsh, Moffett, Myers and Newhall. There were absent, Messrs. Gilroy, Squires and Watson. The hour of beginning was 8:30. The hour of closing was midnight.

Mayor Male, Corporation Counsel Marsh, Street Commissioner Angleman, County Road Surveyor Dunham, Chief of Police Carey, and Tax Collector Brown, Chief of Fire Department [illegible], Assessor Hubbard, about a dozen would-be contractors for the city's coming water works, and Mr. Hugh Gilligan, were also present, but Mr. Hugh Miskey was gratifyingly absent. On a chair at the left of the clerk's table, was a huge pile of bids for the water works franchise and specifications therefore.

After the reading of the minutes of the previous meeting, the President instructed the clerk to read any communications he had received in relation to the matter of water works. As the documents were piled up, the clerk read from the top, and the last received was read first. It was from Wheeler & Parks of Boston, and the memoranda attached were omitted; but the accompanying certified check of $2,000 as a guarantee of good faith, was not overlooked.

After an elaborate specification of what they would build in the way of a plant, and what service would be guaranteed, the bidders proposed to pay the city $5,000 for an exclusive franchise until such time as the city might choose to purchase the works. They would furnish water free to all public buildings, including schools, public drinking fountains, and for the flushing of sewers. The city to pay $6,000 a year for the 200 hydrants specified, and $30 per annum for each additional hydrant. After ten years the city should have the privilege of purchasing the works at their original cost, plus ten per cent. and six per cent. per year in addition. Or the bidders, Wheeler & Parks, would enter into contract to complete the works as required and indicated at actual cost thereof with an added compensation not to exceed 15 per cent.

The Commonwealth Water Company of Newark, stated that after a careful examination of the specifications presented by the Council, it was found impossible to make a proposition under them that would be satisfactory, although their company was particularly well fitted to furnish the city of Plainfield with a satisfactory water supply. The correspondent requested a conference with the Water Committee.

Messrs. Malone Peters, of Philadelphia, John Lockwood & Son, of New York, J. M. Lowe, of Kingston, Moffett, Hodgkins & Clark, of Watertown, Chas. K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell, E. C. Woltmann and E. F. Fuller, and Francis H. Smith, of New York, also presented bids and specifications which were read and referred to the Water Committee to be reported on at a meeting of the Council to be held on the 16th day of September.

The various specifications provided for the procuring of the water from subterranean wells, from Green and Cedar Brooks, and from the Passaic River near Union Village. The water to be thoroughly filtered and pumped into steel standpipes thirty feet in diameter with an altitude of [illegible] feet above the level at Park avenue and Front street. The works to be completed in from six to twelve months.

The different bids offered the city hydrants at $15, $30 and $40 respectively—the highest price being in case the water supply was obtained from Passaic River.

Each bid was accompanied by a certified check of $1,000, which the clerk was instructed to hand the treasurer for deposit in the bank, unendorsed, for safe keeping.

Charles Hand proposed to erect a City Hall on Second street and rent it for five years to the city with privilege of purchase. It was referred.

L. W. Serrell asked the Corporation Counsel to obtain injunctions against the rebuilding of any broken dams, and to discover if the public have any rights that the dam owners are bound to respect.

Mr. Marsh moved that this dam question be tied, and offered a resolution in relation to it.

Mr. Marsh's resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Corporation Counsel be requested to inform the Council by the next meeting whether the city can in any action at law prevent the building or rebuilding of any dam on Green Brook within or beyond the city limits, not required for milling purposes, and also whether the city can require adequate flood gates in any dams along said Green Brook that may be built or rebuilt.

Resolved, That the Mayor and Corporation Counsel are authorized and requested forthwith to confer and cooperate with county and township authorities in any action that may be deemed necessary in the premises or to proceed independently in behalf of the city of Plainfield to protect the city and the citizens of Plainfield against improperly constructed dams.

The following claims were presented, referred, and subsequently ordered paid, amounting to in the general fund, $2,525.19; fire department, $735.55; poor fund, $772.50:

The treasurer's, collector's and city physician's reports were received and filed.

The mayor reported that there was not the slightest danger from the big dam at Feltville, which report was endorsed by Isaac W. Pangborn.

It was moved that when the Council adjourned it be to meet on the 20th day of August.

Samuel H. Allen, janitor of the public library, was nominated by the mayor as a special policeman and confirmed by the Council.

A crosswalk was ordered laid across Third place at Ninth street.

Mr. Marsh, from the Committee on Streets, reported that Mr. Daft had repeatedly assured them that the only delay in the exhibition of his proposed electric street railway was because of the delay in the construction of the special car for the purpose. The Committee then suggested that an ordinary car be fitted up. Subsequently, early in July, Mr. Daft told the Committee that he had countermanded his first order for the model car, and had ordered one from another firm, that would be ready in about twenty days. Since then Mr. Marsh said, no communication had been received from Mr. Daft.

It was thereupon by the Council unanimously resolved, that the time allowed Mr. Daft be extended until the first day of September, and if the promised exhibition be not arranged by that time, all privileges granted him will be annulled and the street railway propositions of others be then opened for consideration.

Councilman Jenkins suggested that the Council consider the lake behind the [illegible] Feltville dam as a source of water supply for the city.

The Council then adjourned.

It is rumored that the Mayor of the Colorado of the West has wired the Mayor of Colorado of the East—"Draw on me for twenty-six dollars in aid of the sufferers of the writhing, wrestling, vicious, violent, raging, rampant, fierce and furious Plainfield flood. Though the city [illegible] go, may the [illegible] be spared to build it up once more."

An Inspector for Half a Century.

William M. McCutchen, who died on August 1, at his home in North Plainfield, in his eighty-seventh year, was said to be the oldest inspector of fire insurance risks in this country. He had been an inspector for a half century, and had inspected risks for the Equitable, Union Mutual, Washington, Etna, and other well-known companies.

He was employed by the City Fire Insurance Company of New York, to within eighteen months of his death. He was born in that city, and was originally a master builder. He entered the insurance business in 1840 as inspector for the Contributionship Company, long since out of business.

NOT A SPEEDY SNAP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS: There seems to be an idea prevalent in Plainfield, that a franchise for supplying the city with water must be very valuable, and that any one who gets it should be made to pay handsomely for the privilege.

A growing place, with a population (including North Plainfield) of, say, 15,000, with a fair proportion of wealthy property owners, and a large number possessing homes of their own and comfortable incomes, does seem an attractive location to supply with water, especially to a stranger not familiar with all the modifying conditions.

In the first place, the income from hydrants would never reach a very large figure, owing to the constitutional disinclination of the average Plainfield taxpayer to pay out money for public improvements. Mr. Marsh ably represented this class of people, when, at a recent meeting of the Council, he soberly suggested, as an item of economy in the proposed water works, that a number of the hydrants could be omitted in the vicinity of the present fire wells, which latter would answer just as well; he did not seem to realize that a hydrant, to which a hose could be directly attached, and a stream thrown over almost any house, offered any advantage over a well from which the water must be pumped by a fire engine.

The most serious objection, however, in the mind of an investor, is the quality of the water now used for all purposes. Whatever one may think of the objectionable feature of having our wells and cesspools in such close proximity—and it is not a pleasant subject to consider—it cannot be denied that Plainfield now has an excellent drinking water, and the people like it.

It may readily be seen, that, as no one is obliged to use the public water, it would be a long time before the list of consumers reached a paying basis. No doubt in time every one, even in moderate circumstances, would see the advantage of having an ample supply of water in any part of the house, without pumping or carrying it, but it would probably take years to reach this result.

The Ball Players of All Trenton Fail to Get a Run in Plainfield.

The strongest team of ball players that the Crescents have faced this season, met them on Saturday afternoon. But the perfect work of Gately and Bowes, and the almost errorless support of the home nine, shut the visitors out without a run.

It was a great surprise to the latter. They had brought down a picked nine of most of the best players from all the teams in Trenton's pottery league, and the Crescents were assured they would be beaten. It is no doubt a fact that the Trenton nine of Saturday was composed of some very fine players.

But up to the ninth inning, Springgard was the only one of the visitors who reached second, and the only batter who made a hit. In the ninth, however, Humwell got to third and Bandow to second, and it looked as if Trenton would surely get a run. Tiernan had been forced out at second, and Uplander had dropped a fly into McLaughlin's hands, so it all depended on Hornoff the Trenton's daisy first baseman.

A smile spread over Patrick J. Gately's pleased lips. Three times before Hornoff had been at the bat, and each time he had found the ball. But upon this occasion it was different—three times he fanned the wide, wide World, and the game was over.

The Crescent's game was a most creditable one. Lee, whose arm was still lame played second and but three of the Trenton's got there during the entire game. Gordon played short when Cadmus did not get in the way, and the latter was on third. Both Cadmus' errors were caused by his running in front of Gordon to seize short hits that did not belong to him, and which he failed to get. The Crescent's infield works smoother with Lee on third, Gordon on second and Cadmus playing short.

Bowes work behind the bat and his throwing to second, was all that could be desired. Manager Gavett has displayed his judgment again in securing so clever a backstop, and Gately seemed so encouraged that he pitched his best game of the season. The Trentons only got two hits off the Crescent's twirler, while all of the home team hit Tiernan except McMurray, Cadmus and Gately.

That's What's the Matter With Plainfield.

(From the Elizabeth Journal.)

The people of Bayonne are driven nearly crazy by the screeching of the locomotives. The engines "screech when they come, screech when they go, and blow off steam when they stand still."

Who is He?

A New York paper Tuesday says: "Henry H. Allen, 46 years old, 5 feet 6 inches in height, medium build, dark complexion, black eyes and hair, and wearing when last seen a dark suit and black derby hat, is missing from his home in Plainfield, N. J. His friends say he is insane. He carried a leather satchel and two umbrellas."

Escaped from the Borough Lockup.

During Monday afternoon Special Marshal Pangborn of North Plainfield found a drunken man on Craig place, and escorted him to the borough lockup, where he was assigned a cell and given an opportunity to sober up. Between five and six o'clock the prisoner kicked out a section of the cell and escaped, coming direct to this city.

They Read the Sensational Papers.

Here's another evidence of the injury done to Plainfield by the misrepresentation of the recent flood in this city through certain sensational newspapers, notably the [illegible]. Mr. Joseph Sillory Friday received a telegram from some of his relatives in Trenton, telling him to send his family there to escape the terrible flood here. Mr. Sillory wired back word that his family was all right, and that there was no likelihood of a flood.

At Trinity Church.

There was a large attendance at both the morning and evening services in the Trinity Reformed church, Sunday. The Rev. Edwin H. Lewis preached on both occasions. His discourse in the morning was an ably written sermon on "Divine Motherhood." In the evening his subject was: "The part of the will, in righteousness."

At the morning service Miss Clara Josephine Meurs sang Holden's "Nearer My God to Thee," with pleasing effect. She displayed the possession of a rich soprano voice of much cultivation. Her high notes were very full. Mr. A. W. Dudley was the accompanist.

THE OCEAN RECORD BROKEN.

One of the two homing pigeons told of in Thursday's PRESS, that alighted Saturday afternoon, July 27, on the steamship "Othello" of the Wilson line when it was about 260 miles from port, carried a message as follows:

Latitude, 41 degrees, 11 seconds; longitude, 65 degrees. Steamer City of Rome, 5 A. M., July 26.

The homing pigeons "Aerial" and "Dude" are released at this hour. If fortune favors these birds, as it is hoped, they should reach land and the ocean record will have been broken. The American Workingmen's Expedition is on the third day out on its voyage to foreign lands. All well on board. Four anxious birds were released yesterday morning. The separation created great interest, and many God-speeds were showered on the winged messengers as they sped from the ship. Yesterday was another calm day. Better weather for the trip cannot be desired. Although this morning has broken cloudy, wind light and from the Northwest variable, a magnificent day is in prospect. The third officer reports that at this hour the ship is 407 miles from Sandy Hook.

(Signed) C. B. WILLIAMS, Correspondent.

By this message it will be seen that the homers were liberated at daybreak of Friday morning 407 miles from Sandy Hook. They alighted Saturday afternoon very much exhausted, on the Othello when about 260 miles from New York.

Remember that during all day of Friday, land could not be seen from any height the birds would rise to, yet they were coming straight for home guided by some instinct that is yet beyond the powers of the World's wisest men to discover. At night they cannot fly, so from dusk of Friday until morn of Saturday, "Aerial" and "Dude" must have rested together on the topmast of some ship. Saturday they pursued their journey on the wing towards home until they overtook a vessel going their way, and lighted on it.

The bird that flew in a house at Stamford, Conn., to rest, carried this message:

STEAMER CITY OF ROME,
ATLANTIC OCEAN,
Thursday, July 25, 5:45, A. M.

Longitude, 48.36; latitude, 40.30. Captain Young just states that we are now 394 miles out. The pigeons are in good condition. Last night they attracted much attention when brought on deck. This morning, though it is still very early, after-deck is filled. Large number of passengers to see the birds start. The weather is delightful, the air being clear and invigorating and the sky almost cloudless. It is cool but not yet time for overcoats. The wind blows lightly from the N. W. The surface of the ocean is ruffled by the light Summer breeze, not enough to perceptibly influence the motion of the boat. All are well. Germanic, three miles astern. ATWOOD.

BOROUGH COUNCIL MEETING.

The regular meeting of the Borough Council Friday night was unimportant and there was but little business transacted. All the members responded to the roll call except Mr. Emmons. The minutes were read and approved, and sundry applications for peddler's and cartmen's licenses were presented, referred and subsequently granted.

Claims were presented and referred as follows. They were later ordered paid: T. McDonald, $40.80; Pierson & Gayle, $7.09; B. H. Radford, $12; L. Conrad, $3; J. W. A. [illegible], $1 75; J. H. Wilson, $936.92; P. T. B. Nevius, $138.70; M. Powers, $51.80; N. Y. and N. J. Globe Gaslight Co., $207.36; G. Becker, $6; S. Moore, $4; Plainfield Gaslight Co., $14.17; W. Pangborn, $6.

Mayor Cooley made a verbal report. He stated that $130 had been received by him on account of fines, etc., and that a check for that amount had been sent to the Clerk.

Mr. Smalley, as chairman of the Street Committee, also made a verbal report. He said that little work had been done on the streets since the last meeting, owing to the recent rains; in all about $25 has been expended. The iron pipe at Somerset street and Jackson avenue, he said, should be removed, as it was incapable of carrying off the water centering at that point. Some discussion followed, and the matter then dropped.

Mr. McGee from the Fire, Water and Lamps Committee made a verbal report. He said the Chief had reported to the committee the Mountain avenue fire; also that Warren Engine had been used to pump out some of the cellars on Somerset street. The names of W. S. Philpitt and W. D. Adams as members of the Fire Department were submitted for confirmation. Later they were confirmed by resolution adopted.

Mr. Bettman offered a resolution to the effect that the Council proceed to macadamize Willow avenue, at a cost not to exceed $1,100, the property owners agreeing to pay $700 toward the cost of the same. Mr. Bettman said in support of his resolution that the Street Committee had informed him that it would cost about $800 to fill in the washouts caused by the late freshet, and that it would also cost about $300 to grade the avenue. He thought this would be a good time to macadamize the avenue, as the dirt removed from the street could be used to fill in the washouts. A long discussion followed, and the resolution was finally lost, Mr. Bettman being the only member who voted in the affirmative.

The Auditing Committee reported on the claims sent in during the evening and they were ordered paid by warrant.

Council then adjourned.

FOR THE PLAINFIELD SUFFERERS.

The following received at The Netherwood, yesterday, from former guests now at Saratoga, will give a faint idea of the way in which the people all over the United States will join in aiding the mass of human beings already suffering from the terrible flood that has devastated the city, and in burying the dead thousands who will be drowned when "that other dam" bursts:

GRAND UNION HOTEL,
SARATOGA,
August 1, 1889.

The sad intelligence has reached this city of the dire disaster by flood that has overtaken Plainfield and Netherwood. Our advices are incomplete, and it is left to our imagination to see huge waves rolling through the halls of The Netherwood and subjecting Netherwoodians to involuntary baths. We see the beautiful and spacious dining hall an improvised Natatorium, and the attendants, arrayed in life-preservers, waiting on the guests. It seems almost incomprehensible that Netherwood, so recently "dry," should so suddenly and providentially become "wet." Our hearts go out with tender solicitude and sympathy with our friends at Netherwood now indulging in excessive "wetness," in contrast with the preceding "dryness," that could be illy relieved by ginger ale.

With a realizing sense of your condition, the subscribers have been appointed a committee to solicit subscriptions in aid of the sufferers. Money is scarce in this city; principally absorbed by the hotels and the pool-sellers. It was suggested that small subscriptions be solicited, but what is regularly known as "small change" is even scarcer than capital. It is not permitted to wink at Saratoga under fifty cents, while to smile—involves an expenditure equal to the support of a small family for an indefinite period. Yet every one is disposed to give according to his means.

The ladies, with the self-denial characteristic of their sex, have contributed of their jewelry in aid of the sufferers. Gems that erst have sparkled on the brow and breast of beauty have been poured into our laps, and we hasten to forward the first instalment. Just what disposition may be made of these choice gifts your house committee must decide. Conscientious scruples forbid our committee suggesting a lottery, and yet it may not be convenient for any one individual to assume, singly, the heavy purchase of even one of the rare stones.

We trust the proceeds will reach their legitimate destination, and that your committee will not deem it advisable that any gem be dissolved, like Cleopatra's pearl, (Rider Haggard says it was an emerald, but the right of authority favors the pearl,) in rich Falernian wine to drink the health of the Saratoga committee. The committee have taken the liberty of consigning the precious shipment to one of your most popular guests, relying on her wise judgment in disposing of the articles for the best interests of the sufferers.

By order of
MISS ELLA HOLMES,
MRS. C. L. DANA,
Committee.

THIS COUNCIL SHOULD SETTLE IT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—The labor of the Councilmanic Mountain seems to have brought forth the proverbial mouse. Thirty-six copies of the specifications for the construction of Water Works, the concentrated and consolidated product of the present Council, were a few weeks ago distributed to contractors and hydraulic engineers as far East as Boston we are told, West as far as Chicago and South as far as Memphis. This distribution has brought forth but eight responses. In these eight replies there is not to be found one that complies with the terms of the specifications, and a large majority have ignored them altogether. Thus it is shown that the labors of the Council and the expenditure of $300 for an expert engineer and an additional $300 for the advertisement for proposals have practically amounted to nothing. Seemingly the simple adoption by the Council of a resolution calling for the submitting of proposals would have brought forth better results, as it is plain that many professional men of the first class have been forced to refrain from making propositions by the ambiguous and contradictory requirements of the specifications.

More than this, among the eight competitors for the privilege of giving this city the benefit of pure and wholesome water for domestic use and fire protection there appears to be but one who contemplates risking his own capital in the enterprise. Each applicant refers to and apparently relies upon a banker to see his undertaking through to completion. Does it not occur to the public mind that a fair request from a city like ours would meet with a most hearty response from home and foreign capital if the conditions of the project were such as to attract the legitimate investment of funds?

Obviously it would be unfair and unbusinesslike for the Council to accept any of the propositions now before the Water Committee as they are not in accordance with the official requirements, but in themselves there were several propositions submitted on Monday evening which the Council would do themselves great credit to consider seriously and systematically.

The propositions of Messrs Wheeler & Parks, J. M. Low, Woltman & Fuller and Francis H. Smith, present features which should command the investigation of the Board at least. The application of Messrs Moore & Lovell evidently contemplates the immediate acquisition of the works by the city when completed. The extraordinarily low hydrant rental asked is so far below the average for cities of this size and corresponding location that it invites suspicion. The average hydrant rental of the propositions submitted including Moore & Lovell is say $31.50 and that figure is nothing more than fair.

Woltmann & Fuller's proposition appears to be a very taking one, so far as any details were given. The hydrant rental asked was, however, higher than any other, except one, for similar services.

Mr. Francis H. Smith had evidently not received a copy of the amended specifications. His plan and application were incorporated with a sewer system and the latter the Council naturally refused to consider. Like in all the other applications the specifications were ignored in almost every particular, but taking everything in consideration, it was quite the completest paper offered even down to the details of issuing bonds which might at some time be necessary to complete the works. It was unfortunate that the sewer plan could not have been submitted because it is said the two systems were intended to be operated jointly and a provision was incorporated therein which contemplated the lease of the sewers to the city at a very low rate. As a majority of our citizens are apparently more interested in sewers than water it might be well to publish as much of this project as can be obtained for the general information.

Although it cannot be seen yet that the Council has made any progress in the water and sewer enterprise, it is apparent that the citizens are becoming better informed and more interested in the matter and it is possible that sometime in the near future the labors of the present day will bear fruit, and you may depend upon it that whenever there is money enough in a franchise to warrant active competition, one will be obtained. This is one reason why many citizens believe that this question should be disposed of by a competent and intelligent Council and are averse to postponing it to a distant day when the complexion of the Council may not be so satisfactory as it is at present.

Will They Also Sue the "[illegible]" for Damages?

It is said that Messrs John F. Wilson, Morgan S. Taylor, George P. Dupee, Martin L. Cooley, A. W. Haviland and others, who are sufferers by the flood caused by the breaking away of Coddington's dam, have combined to take such legal proceedings as may be necessary to prevent the reconstruction of the broken dam.

Experts Assure Plainfield's Safety.

Much anxiety is felt in Plainfield for the safety of the great dam at Feltville. Several breaks have occurred, but they were immediately repaired. If the dam should break it would destroy a million of property in Plainfield, beside endangering various [illegible].—[illegible]

The above item emanated from the [illegible] of this city. The readers of THE PRESS need not be told again that there is absolutely no danger from the dam spoken of, nor never was. If the dam should break, there would not be enough water spread over the fields to reach as near Plainfield as Milford Cole's Hill.

But besides this fact, Chief of Police Carey, and two painters—Mr. Weaver and Mr. Scott—have been sent as experts to examine the dam. They assure the trembling community of the Colorado of the East, that all is well.

Spinal Disease.

DR. FLINT'S REMEDY should be taken whenever there is felt pain or soreness in the back, or uneasiness in the extremities, increased by motion, as these are the premonitory symptoms of spinal congestion. Bitten by a Mad Dog.

A young child named Hand is reported to have been bitten on the face by a mongrel dog, which showed signs of the rabies, on Peace street, near Fifth, a few days ago, and the child has since been closely watched. Tuesday the vicious brute was seen on Peace street near the railroad bridge, and he was shot without ceremony. The dog has undoubtedly bitten other canines, and owners of dogs would do well to keep a close watch on their animals, or dangerous results may follow.

The Flood Brings Needed Improvements.

Plainfield is to have three handsome new bridges of the same style as that over Green Brook at Grove street.

The Plainfield club has not joined. It has games with other clubs scheduled for the entire season at home. It will, however, be ready to meet the winner of the above league, and try and beat it.

The First Demand Against the City for Damages.

It is only a little one to begin with, but it may be followed by many and greater.

Mr. Frank Campbell who keeps a restaurant at 22 Liberty street, has sent to the City Clerk a bill against the municipality of $19.50 for damages to his meat and matting by reason of the inability of the gutters to carry off the heavy rains.

"For two or three years," Mr. Campbell tells a PRESS reporter, "the buildings in that section of the city have been flooded whenever there was a shower. I can't afford to employ a lawyer, but shall try by personal demands upon the Council to get redress."

Mayor Male Acts Promptly, and Mr. Ackerman Immediately Responds.

The following message wired Thursday, shows what immediate and energetic action the Mayor has taken upon consultation with the Corporation Counsel, to protect the city and its people:

> To Mr. Warren Ackerman, New York:
>
> Examination of Feltville dam reveals imminent danger of bursting in case of another rainfall. This would destroy a million of property and endanger human life in Plainfield. Believing that you do not know these facts, I vouch for the good faith of the examination made, and appeal to you, the owner of the dam, to act at once to avert the threatened calamity.
>
> (Signed.) JOB MALE, Mayor
> Plainfield, N. J.

Mr. Ackerman promptly answered the above and appointed a meeting in Plainfield on the arrival of the 1:30 train that afternoon.

He then promised to do all in his power; to put on a force of men to watch the dam, and to drain off the water gradually so as to leave only two or three feet in case of heavy rain.

Mr. Ackerman practically agreed to adopt Mayor Male's suggestion to build a new dam of the strongest possible kind to buttress the old. The Mayor desired the removal of the dam entirely, but Mr. Ackerman wants the dam to remain, and says that he will spare no expense to make it absolutely safe.

Some concerted movement should be made by the citizens of Plainfield in the way of sending a request to Superintendent Wm. H. Peddie, desiring the stopping of the needless shrieking of the locomotive whistles through the city at all hours of the night and day.

Plainfield's Got What Paterson Needs.

Apropos of the demoralized condition of the Paterson, N. J., Fire Department, the Call of that city says: "Every fire that occurs convinces us that the sooner the Aldermen organize a paid department, with a competent, permanent Chief, the better it will be for the public in general and the insurance companies in particular."

A Lasting Improvement.

The First Baptist church sheds were undermined and nearly wrecked by the high water on Tuesday, and considerable cost will necessarily be incurred in repairing the damage done. The trustees of the church could perhaps employ no better means to protect their property in the future, than to erect along the brook bulwarks of logs such as Capt. Wm. Hand put up in the rear of Messrs Robert Cook, Martin I. Cooley and other Rockview avenue residents' property a year or so ago. Tuesday's flood had no effect whatever upon the work Capt. Hand performed along Stony Brook, and wherever he has done similar services the job has invariably proved a lasting and paying improvement.

Sanders Gives Himself to Justice.

George Sanders, late in the employ of R. W. Rice & Co., the grocers, returned Thursday of his own volition and appeared with his counsel, Charles A. Reed, Esq., before Justice Hardy of North Plainfield.

The charge was the misappropriation of $1[illegible]. Sanders did not plead, but his counsel offered surety for the accused to await the action of the Grand Jury of Somerset county.

Justice Hardy fixed the bail at $1,000, and was very particular that the security should be unquestioned. He finally accepted a wealthy woman of Bound Brook and a business man of Plainfield, who swore to the possession of many times the amount required.

Hap Bit Off More Than We Can Swallow.

Somebody by the name of "Wm. F. Sands," writes to the Chief of Police as follows:

> How can the people of Plainfield ever be able to thank you for your noble heroism during the recent disaster which has struck New Jersey's "Queen City" to the heart? Your indefatigable personal exertions generously offered, your assiduity in succoring the people who have chosen you as their guardian, your zeal so faithfully displayed throughout, all go to make up a debt for which the people of Plainfield can never repay you. I feel that I am voicing the opinion of every Plainfielder, great and small.

Gracious! Sakes! Alive! But who are you "Wm. F. Sands," anyway? And, by the way, ain't you assuming a big contract in "voicing the opinion of every Plainfielder, great and small?"

The Cause of the Greatest Damage.

Sensational reports of the flood in this city, have done Plainfield a thousand fold more harm than the high waters.

What else but disgust and indignation can be felt for the editor of a local paper who will admit such stuff as this to its columns:

> (From the news of Wednesday.)
>
> Torn through its heart by a great flood of water, Plainfield today is but a ragged and dishevelled likeness of its former self.
>
> A rumbling, twisting, awful whirl of billows went dashing, foaming, whirling, down Wetumpka Falls and through the gorge.
>

> Plainfield in Peril—The Great Dam at Feltville Threatens to Succumb—Two Couriers on Horseback give Warning—Men Working Like Beavers to Repair the Breaks.

The damage done the city by such sensational fabrications, is incalculable. A PRESS reporter was shown Friday letters received by the proprietor of The Netherwood, in which the correspondents wanted to know if it was safe to come to Plainfield and whether they could get to the Hotel.

Plainfield's Real Peril.

From the depths of its inexcusable ignorance, the Elizabeth Herald in speaking of the rot that emanated from the Somerset Street Sensational Shop regarding Plainfield's recent flood, says: "It is such journalistic enterprise that tells, and which the people are looking for."

You are right, brother. It tells, and tells plainly, what fools, and worse, these mortals be. But what the "people are looking for" is some redress for the dire damage done the city by the columns of barefaced falsehoods published in the news and filtered into other papers.

THE PRESS has been solicited by hundreds, including even a member of the Board of Freeholders, to devote its columns to an extended exposure of the scores of lies that have been published to the lasting damage of Plainfield. This we must decline to do. Our readers are the intelligent people of the community, and thoroughly understand the state of the case.

As long as certain timid merchants of Plainfield will permit themselves to be compelled to contribute their advertisements to the support of the news, just so long must the city suffer the editions of the sheet.

—Somebody rang the fire call on the District Messenger box in the house formerly occupied by D. H. Mulford, on Crescent avenue, about three o'clock Monday afternoon. The tower bell was rung and the department turned out. The house was found to be empty of everything, and no signs of any fire.

Prohibition Plainfielder's Water Beats 'Em All

Nearly all the large cities in this part of the country are grumbling about their bad drinking water. Trenton don't grumble, because it don't have to. We have the best and purest water supply in New Jersey.—Trenton State Gazette. Except Phillipsburg, which has the best water in the State, and an abundant supply.—Warren Democrat.

What Would Happen If "That Feltville Dam" Had Burst.

Last Thursday evening's news contained at the head of the first column of its first page, the infamous falsehood that "the great dam at Feltville, the only one not wrecked by Tuesday's flood, was trembling before the surging mass of water locked within the bosom of the lake and that the resistless tide threatened to rush through its frail and weakening barrier and to sweep the city of Plainfield through its heart."

It will probably be years before Plainfield will recover in any degree from the check given its growth and the indirect damage done its future prosperity, by just such pieces of criminal sensationalism that have recently filled the columns of the news and drifted from thence into other papers of this and other States.

The "surging mass of water" spoken of was "locked within the bosom of a lake" so deep (?) that months ago Fish Commissioners of the State waded all over it and declined to stock it because too shallow.

There was not in the whole lake "resistless tide" enough to "sweep through the heart" of even the vacant meadows of Fanwood. A man might even stand knee-deep in any of Plainfield's brooks and let that dam burst, and he wouldn't get his waist wet.

How to Tell the Different Grades.

In making a selection of a pair of pantaloons at the great $3 closing out sale by Watson & Co. you can tell what the different grades were sold for prior to July 15, by the style of their trimming.

All the showy plaids and stripes with brown and gold satin waistbands were $7 pants and the broken plaids and small shaded lines in light and medium colors with plain satin trimmings and nickel plate buttons were the $6 styles, while the cut-line stripes, silk mixtures, corkscrew and Jacquard weaves with regular trimmings were sold for $5 a pair, and now they are often preferred to either the $7 or $6 pants when you can take your choice of any for $3.

The odd pants cut from custom patterns are mostly 30, 31 and 32 in seam, and are added to the stock daily while they are cutting up the balance of their custom goods, as the extension of their cutting rooms through to Market street compels them to close their custom department until they get their new cutting rooms in shape. Watson & Co. want plenty of room for their cutting force, as they will not have any garments sold by them cut by the machines now used by the trade. They want more careful and economical work and believe in employing skilled mechanics to cut their garments.—Newark Press.

Why Should I Go to Montana?

Great Reservation. Because 17,500,000 acres of fine Government land, with a delightful climate, and equally suited for general farming and stock raising, have just been opened to the home seeker, in the Milk River Valley and near Benton and Great Falls.

Stock Raising. Because the favorable climate and superior grasses of Montana make it the natural home of horses, cattle, sheep and other domestic animals; and because Winter feeding is not required, as stock graze at large the year around.

General Farming. Because a rich soil and abundant Summer rains produce wheat, oats, rye, barley and the grasses and vegetables of a quality, size and yield unsurpassed.

Mining. Because Montana produces more of the precious metals than any other State or territory, and abundant opportunities remain to secure valuable properties at nominal cost.

Immigration. Because the Great Reservation is the meeting point of settlers from the Pacific Coast and from the Eastern States, and is the only extensive tract of good land left, suitable for settlement.

Business. Because the rapidly growing towns along the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry. offer splendid opportunities to engage in business.

Manufacturer. Because the 1,000,000 horse-power water-power at Great Falls, the extensive coal mines, the wool, mineral and grain raising resources of Montana offer exceptional opportunities to the manufacturer.

Tourist. Because the canon of the Gates of the Mountains, the Great Falls of the Missouri, the Giant Fountain and Continental Divide offer the most sublime and diversified scenery to be found on the Continent. Take a Summer tour.

Why Travel by the St. P., M. & M.? Because only by it can you travel through the largest body of free land left for settlement. Because it reaches the Great Falls, with the largest water-power on the Continent. Because it reaches Helena, the richest city of its size in the world; and because it is the shortest and best route to Butte, the largest mining camp on earth. Special settlers' and land seekers' rates. Daily trains through solid to Montana. Choice of three routes to the Pacific Coast. THREE KINDS!

I know
The past, and thence I will essay to glean
A warning for the future, so that man
May profit by his errors, and derive
Experience from his folly.—SHELLEY.

Then comes the thoughtless man, who wends his way to the fashionable tailor, gets a good suit, but pays a very big price for the same.

The wise man deals with some reputable manufacturer of Clothing and secures garments fully equal to those made to order at about half custom prices. Thus the wise man gets his Clothing, with quality and workmanship thrown in, as cheap as the foolish man his miserable trash. An unusually large number of wise men are being attracted to our store this Spring. Whether it's a case of "once bitten twice shy" or not, we don't know, but certainly their patronage of us does credit to their good judgment, and we don't think, once having traded here they'll be caught by clap-trap again. We know what we sell. We make it, and neither time, effort or money is spared to produce garments that will do us credit and still further establish our reputation. It's a selfish interest we take, we'll admit, but the effect is the same. It's there, and it pays both you and us.

HIS HIDDEN TREASURE.

An Interesting Tradition of the Blackfeet Indians.

It Grew Out of the Massacre of a Band of Emigrants on the Plains of Montana. The Box of Shining Buttons and the [illegible].

COPYRIGHT 1889.

The other day I was up at the Piegan agency, near Fort Benton, Montana, and met a grizzled old veteran of the frontier, who remembers when Fort Benton was 700 miles from a railroad, as the agent, for that matter, and who always has some interesting incident to recall of those adventurous fur trading days, when this wild region was truly wild.

"GOOD BOY! CAN'T EAT 'IM NER WEAR IT"

A couple of ragged, dirty and listless Indians were lounging—almost lying—upon the corner of the Agency store.

"You bet!" was old Gray's rejoinder, as I made some such observation to him. "Don't you forget that those Piegans are Blackfeet, and the Blackfeet, you know (most of 'em live over on the Canadian side now round Calgary and Medicine Hat) were the terror of this whole region a few years ago, and nothing could lick 'em short of about twice as many Crows or Assiniboines. I've seen these same Piegans make it hot for a whole trading post more'n once."

Now the Piegans are limited to a poor reservation, decimated by disease and forgetting their former glory and the savage glee of the buffalo hunt, the raid, and the fight at dawn, in which their fathers rejoiced.

You have seen in a menagerie the intent and covetous gaze which a leopard bends upon the keeper when he comes in with a basket of meat; or, perhaps—and one shudders to see it—upon some smiling babe cooing against its mother's shoulder as she halts near the cage. Thus, almost, was the gaze of these two Indians now concentrated upon the agent, who, presiding at his desk [illegible] a remittance of money, was counting out a lot of gold coins.

Old Gray noticed it as well as I, and said it recalled to his memory an incident, or I may now say a tradition, which was well known to the frontiersmen and traders of forty years ago in this vicinity.

A [illegible] one of the subchiefs, or band leaders, among the Piegan Blackfeet was a daring spirit named Little Dog, who, though he had the wit to remain at peace with the traders of the American Fur Company, was accustomed to lead his warriors on long forays, not only into the hunting grounds and camps of the red skinned enemies of the Blackfeet—and that meant every other tribe within raiding distance—but also against parties of emigrants, traders, trappers or hunters not connected with the posts at Fort Benton or The Marias.

On one such raid Little Dog had forced his way through the country of the Flatheads and Nez Perces down to the banks of Snake River, in what now is central Idaho, where the Oregon Trail followed the river back for a distance on the way between Fort Hall and Fort Walla Walla.

He had been attracted there by the report that white emigrants, in increasing numbers, were passing westward along the lonely road, each company possessing trains of wagons loaded with, what to the Indian's eye, seemed fabulous wealth. It was in the hope of finding and conquering one of these parties that Little Dog and his followers had risked their lives so far from home.

Disposing his warriors in a situation favorable for attack, the Indian waited and watched with impatience for the coming of a train. At last, far over the yellow plain, the white tops of a few wagons are seen creeping over the back of the ridge, and with feverish scrutiny the [illegible] count them and with his fingers signals their number to his anxious companions below.

"THEM BLACK'S WERE FIGHTERS"

On they come. They are drawn by oxen which jog lazily forward, their tongues protruding with heat and thirst. The drivers, tanned to tile on the dry plains, with the hardships of so long a march, trudge heavily beside them, now and then arousing themselves to yell blasphemously at the slow stepping beasts, or to wake the echoes with resounding whacks from their great whips. The procession winds nearer and nearer, until—at last the caravan, ill-conscious of the lurking [illegible], rolls into the [illegible] of the ambush.

A terrific whooping and the rush of painted foes surprise the immigrants, and while the arrows hurtle, the swinging skull-crushers crash down, and the scalping knife does its swift and bloody work; there is time for little use of [illegible]. Before all have been struck down [illegible], or perhaps, two or three [illegible] steal away and hide in the rocks.

The eager sack of the wagons then follows. [illegible] with the [illegible] glee of the savage, would seize upon and pervert or destroy all he did not understand the value of, and could not employ as an ornament or easily carry away. The [illegible] of Little Dog was little regarded at such a time, but it happened that among the things upon which he first laid his fingers a small, strong box, carefully stowed under the seat of the foremost wagon.

A blow of his [illegible] burst it open and disclosed to the astonished eyes of the chief a great quantity of what he thought to be brass buttons—three or four double handfuls—but none of these buttons had eyes. Now such buttons, complete, would have been thought a very desirable acquisition by the Indians. They often bought them at the fort on the Missouri, and paid good prices for them, too. But what could be done with them so long as they lacked eyes? They were very heavy, too, and home was far away. Alas! That the white man should make such a mistake as to load his wagon with so useless an article! But Little Dog could not bear to simply throw away those glittering [illegible], and climbing [illegible] the [illegible] he hid the box with [illegible] in a [illegible] which jutted into the [illegible] at that point, sure that he would find it when he wished to.

Perhaps in after years Little Dog's thoughts reverted sometimes to the hidden buttons, but he did not esteem them of sufficient value to warrant another hazardous expedition for their recovery, and they remained in their hiding place, unsought for twenty years.

Then population began to flow into Montana, and gold coin, unknown to the earlier fur-traders, began to circulate in the territory. Little Dog was at the post one day when a prospector was making some purchases, and he saw eagles and half-eagles lying on the counter. These were his "buttons without eyes!" With them men were buying from the trader goods [illegible], tea, sugar, tobacco, powder—all that the Indian longed for. And he had enough of those good pieces hidden away in the dark recess of the Snake to purchase stores of goods over and over. Oh, that he could recover it! How rich and powerful he would be in the village—how much dignity he could acquire—what guns and horses he would have, how gayly should his young new squaw dress! But times had changed. He was old. The Snake was now a weary day's journey away, and food was scarce. He could only lament the folly which had led him to throw the treasure away.

Little Dog told of his "buttons" and how he had hidden them. The people at the Fort were interested and put faith in the story, and at last Mr. Dawson, then in charge of the Post, offered to give the old Piegan a pony and provisions [illegible], if he would lead him to the spot. Little Dog demurred. His "medicine" was against the expedition, he said, and he feared to go. Dawson urged, until finally the old man consented and the two started, but Little Dog had travelled only a short distance when he was overcome by superstitious fear and turned back, never to risk offending his guardian again by such temerity.

"Was the treasure never found?" I asked Gray when his recital had ceased.

"No, but it has been searched for many times. In fact, I once took a day myself. Little Dog tried to describe to me the exact spot in the canon just before he died, and I thought I found it, but I could not locate the cache."

"Do you believe it exists?"

"Certainly, I do, and some day some feller'll hit upon it by pure accident, and he'll wonder how it got there, more'n if he seen a coyote sayin' his prayers."

EMORY [illegible].

TOO MUCH ALIKE.

The Trouble a Young Lawyer Had with Pretty Twins.

"Yes," assented Mr. Bird, with evident appreciation, as he ran his fingers caressingly through his iron gray hair; "yes, sir, as you observe, they are very pretty girls, and their likeness to each other, in every way, is truly wonderful."

The remark was made in answer to a tribute of respect which the writer had paid to a pair of young ladies—I use the word "pair" advisedly, because they were twins—who had passed out of the office of Mr. Bird, one of the oldest and most highly respected members of the Middlesex bar.

"I knew the mother of those girls and her father and their parents more than thirty years ago. The grandparents of those girls were clients of the man with whom I read law, and afterward their children became my clients, and now I am the legal adviser of both the grandchildren. I don't think, however, that these children are as much alike as were their mother and her sister. You could not tell them apart at all unless you had them together."

At this point one of the young ladies returned, with a little rush and flurry, saying, in a very pretty tone:

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Bird, but I went off without my gloves."

"Don't apologize, don't apologize, I pray, Miss—Miss—ah, Miss Annie. I am only too glad to see you in my office or my house at any time."

"Alice, you mean, Mr. Bird; but I thank you for the compliment all the same," and away she fluttered.

"Confound it!" growled the old gentleman, as he resumed his seat, after closing the door upon the fair visitor. "I'd have sworn that one was Annie." Then he looked up with a smile, after thinking a few minutes, and resumed: "If you can spare a few minutes and care to hear it, I will tell you how I came near going crazy getting mixed up with the mother of these young ladies and her sister."

Of course, nothing would please me better, and I said so at once. Mr. Bird produced an ancient and most respectable pair of cigars, and when we had lighted them he proceeded:

"The maiden name of these young ladies' mother and her twin sister was Van Scriver, and their father, old John Van Scriver, was a large farmer and miller, quite wealthy, living near Princeton. I had been admitted to the bar only about a year when he [illegible] my preceptor, in whose office I was still located, had the settlement of the estate.

"On one occasion he wrote to the girls, who were the only heirs, that he needed some memoranda from some papers in the homestead, and that on a day he mentioned he would be there to get them, asking the girls to look up the papers in the meantime. When the day came the old man was particularly engaged, and asked me to take his horse and carriage and do the errand; I was only too glad to oblige him.

"In due season I reached the homestead, was received by a staid, elderly housekeeper and ushered into the parlor, where I was greeted by one of the brightest and most beautiful young ladies I had ever seen. I told her who I was and how I came to be there.

"'That is all satisfactory, Mr. Bird. We are glad to see any friend of Mr. Adair's. Be seated, and I will have the papers ready for you in a few minutes. Excuse me, please,' and she disappeared.

"I sat pleasurably thinking of the young lady who had just left me, when the housekeeper came in with cake and wine after the good, old-fashioned custom, and asked me to enjoy them. I had been alone but a very short time, it appeared to me, when the young lady returned with [illegible] in her hand; but instead of coming forward, she stopped and stared at me in a most embarrassing way.

"'Did you find the papers?' I asked, in my most courtly tones.

"'Sir?' she exclaimed, with a Jack Frost in her beautiful voice. 'Did I what?'

"'Find the papers you went after.'

"'What are you talking about? Who are you, sir, and pray what are you doing here?'

"'The only thing I'm doing at present, madam,' I responded in tones quite as frigid as her own, 'is leaving here as soon as possible.'

"'Oh, thank you,' she replied, with lofty dignity, as the maddest young man in New Jersey slammed the door behind him.

"Long afterward I learned that I had hardly driven away when the housekeeper entered the room, and Miss Laura Van Scriver, with her dignity still at its full height, demanded:

"'Who was that horrid, impudent young man I found in the parlor just now?'

"'Why, he's the young man Mr. Adair sent down for some papers that Miss Maggie has gone to get. Where is he?'

"Miss Laura responded by dropping into a chair and exclaiming, with almost a shriek:

"'Oh, my! haven't I done it? Why, Mrs. [illegible], I actually drove the poor fellow out of the house. What in the world will I do?'

"'[illegible] for gracious sake tell Maggie. I'll make it up with Mr. Adair somehow.'

"The result was that Miss Maggie Van Scriver never heard of my [illegible] treatment, and was for a time filled with wonder as to what manner of [illegible] I could possibly be, having driven [illegible] miles to [illegible] around and then gone off without my [illegible].

"I nursed my wrath and kept it nice and warm until I reached home, and then poured it all out to Mr. Adair, whose laughter was so long and uproarious that I took a fresh installment of vicarious indignation, and was about giving the old gentleman a piece of my mind when he took me [illegible], while he wiped away the tears of [illegible] and comforted me by saying: 'Bird, my dear fellow, it is all my fault. I utterly forgot to tell you that the girls are twins, and so terribly alike that you can't tell one from the other [illegible].'

"The next day brought a wondering letter from Miss Maggie, asking what had caused my sudden and unaccountable departure, and desiring to know if [illegible] whom she had inadvertently hurt [illegible], and would Mr. Adair please tell her [illegible] all about it, anyhow.

"'Now, here's your chance, Bird,' said the old man, handing me the letter. 'Just [illegible] team and have another drive down. You can fix up the matter, whatever it is, in a jiffy, and get what I want this time.'

"Away I went, and in due time was in the Van Scriver parlor. I [illegible] a young lady as she came forward and offered her hand, which I [illegible]. I was sure of Maggie Van Scriver.

"'I'm very glad to see you, Mr. Bird. Pray what made you leave so unceremoniously on Monday?'

"'Well, Miss Maggie, I thought it was [illegible] I might be [illegible].'

"'Indeed! Just because I left you a [illegible] wine and cake?'

"'Not at all. The refreshments were as acceptable as they were gracefully tendered.'

"'Then why did you go away before I returned?'

"'I didn't go away before you returned. I stayed until you came back and practically turned me out of the house.'

"'I turned you out of the house?' she exclaimed, in blank amazement. 'Why, I never did any thing of the kind.'

"'I am sorry to contradict a lady; but you certainly did.'

"By this time I had forgotten all about the twins in the case, and Miss Maggie's brow darkened ominously as she said, gravely:

"'Mr. Bird, have you been drinking? I wish you to distinctly understand that I am not a story-teller, and I say I never saw you after I went out of this room after the papers.'

"'Miss Van Scriver, I want it distinctly and emphatically borne in mind that I am not a liar, and if you had not in effect turned me out of the house, pretending to know nothing about me, I should not have gone away.'

"Then Miss Maggie's eyes flashed as she retorted:

"'And you can not oblige me more than by going away again.'

"I was half way across the yard to my carriage when I heard a tearfully penitent voice, crying: 'Oh, Maggie! Call him back! Don't let him go! It was I that did it!'

"I turned in considerable astonishment, and there stood both girls on the porch, looking so terribly alike that staring at them in semi-idiotic wonder I could not for the life of me have told which was the other. There is but little more of it. The story of how Laura 'fired me out' and concealed the fact from Maggie had to be told numberless times, until the moon shone brightly down upon my pleasant reflections as I pursued homeward the lonely road that was not lonely at all."

"Well," asked the writer, "is that all there is of it?"

"Yes," said Mr. Bird, with a queer smile, "except that I am the uncle of those two girls that just left us and the mischievous Laura is their aunt."—Lieutenant J. D. Chandler, in Leslie's Newspaper.

JOYS OF FARM LIFE.

One Day's Adventure on the Old Willis Homestead.

A Hawk, a Snake, a Ground-Hog and a Bear Keep Johnny Hustling—Rural Life Made a Burden by Depredators of All Kinds.

"Johnny, git your gun!"

"That," said Miles Boyd, the gun man, to a New York Sun reporter, "wasn't any one singing the refrain of the popular but somewhat frayed comic song, but was the impassioned exclamation of Farmer John Willis of Sullivan County, at whose house among the hills I was a guest last week. Farmer Willis was doing his chores about the barn-yard one morning. His chickens were scratching and picking away in his immediate vicinity, confident, no doubt, in the fact of his protecting presence, when a cheeky hawk, unmindful of that presence, swooped down from somewhere and swooped away again with one of the over-confident chickens before the farmer's very eyes. To add to the audacity and aggravating nature of the act, the hawk flew to the branch of a dead tree, not a hundred yards away, and proceeded there and then to rend the still squawking member of the farmer's feathered flock, and make a breakfast on it. The daring performance knocked Farmer Willis speechless for a moment, but when the momentary paralytic wave had passed and released his vocal organism, he raised his voice and yelled:

"Johnny is Farmer Willis' hired man, John Grimes. Every body calls him Johnny. He has a gun. He keeps it ready to hand behind the kitchen door. Johnny at the time the farmer issued his startling order was greasing a set of single harness on the back stoop. He heard his employer's call and instantly obeyed it. He hadn't seen the swoop down nor the going up of the hawk, but he ran with his gun to the barn-yard.

"'Yonder he is, goll durn him!' exclaimed the farmer, pointing to the feasting hawk in the dead tree. 'He's got the dominick hen! Whang him!'

"The range was a little too long for the capacity of Johnny's gun, so Johnny attempted to creep up on the hawk and get a sure shot. But the hawk didn't have that proverbial eye of his for nothing, and before Johnny and his gun reached a point at which danger threatened him, the hawk gathered together the remnants of the chicken, and in a very short time was a speck against the sky, and a cannon ball couldn't have reached him.

"'Them ding hawks gits sassier and sassier every day!' exclaimed Farmer Willis. 'We'll have to be chainin' the house down soon or they'll carry that off!'

"Johnny went back with his gun and put it in its place behind the door, and resumed his work on the harness. Farmer Willis proceeded with his chores. His wife was weeding onions in the garden down back of the house. The excitement caused by the attack of the hawk on the poultry and his deliberate but masterly retreat with his plunder had passed away. A half hour later up from among the green things growing there came a shrill and penetrating shriek:

"'Johnny, git yer gun!'

"It was the voice of Mrs. Farmer Willis. It was burdened with alarm. Johnny dropped his harness and once more snatched the gun. Down through the garden he sped, followed by Farmer Willis, who had heard his wife's shriek.

"'Yonder he goes!' screamed the excited farmer's wife. 'Down yonder he runs to'ards the brush lot! He's got one o' my old Brahma hen's chickens!'

"'It's a ding funny hawk to be a runnin'!' said Farmer Willis, puffing hard.

"Johnny had hurried on with his gun, but the black snake had escaped with his prize to his hiding place, and he couldn't be found.

"'Agricultural pursuits seems lively this mornin',' growled Farmer Willis, mopping his head with his bandana and walking back toward the barn-yard. 'Specially in the poultry department.'

"Mrs. Farmer Willis, bemoaning the taking off of her peeping pet, resumed her work among the onions. Johnny lugged the gun back and put it behind the kitchen door, and busied himself in softening the harness once more. The usual calm rested on and about the farm, and remained unbroken for an hour or so, when it was suddenly ruffled again. This time a piping alarm came from the meadow near the house. Farmer Willis' twelve-year-old boy Tommy stood on the stone wall waving his [illegible]. It was his thin treble that set the household by the ears this time.

"'Johnny, git your gun!' it piped.

"Johnny dropped his harness and grabbed his gun. Down toward the meadow he dashed on the double-quick. Farmer Willis dusted after him. Mrs. Willis brought up the rear.

"'There's a big ground hog got his hole in the medder!' said Tommy, when the family contingent arrived panting on the scene. 'I seen him, and he's eat up half an acre o' the best clover!'

"'Hawks, snakes and ground hogs'll raise the price o' produce on this farm more than [illegible], if they keep on!' exclaimed Farmer Willis, and he told Johnny to find the ground hog and kill it on sight. Then he and his wife returned to their respective duties. Johnny laid for the ground hog until dinner time, but the ground hog kept to his hole. Then Johnny raised the siege and went back to the house. After dinner the farmer and Johnny filled their pipes and were enjoying a consoling smoke on the back stoop, when they saw a man coming down the road toward the house on a dead run. It was neighbor Sam Bush. Neighbor Sam paused at the farm gate a moment to catch his breath, and then burst out with:

"John jumped for the gun again, and the family followed him to the gate to hear what new danger was threatening the property of Willis' farm.

"'A [illegible] big b'ar has jest come outen your sheep pastur',' said Sam, 'and has gone into the beech with one o' your lambs!'

"'Well, there!' exclaimed Farmer Willis. 'If night don't come purty soon I wouldn't be willin' to give six dollars for all that'll be left o' this farm w'en it does come!'

"Then Johnny and the gun and the farmer and neighbor Sam started for the beech to get the b'ar. I had to leave for home, and I haven't heard whether they got it or not."

An Irish Mocking Bird.

A valuable mocking bird was stolen from a Savannah gentleman awhile ago. After many unsuccessful efforts to recover it his owner casually heard that a Northern visitor who had been in the city all winter was preparing [illegible] with a remarkable bird, and hurrying off to the sailing vessel he found that the bird in the passenger's possession was his own lost treasure. The new owner, however, would not admit his claim, and [illegible] finally arranged he should make complaint before a magistrate and prove that the bird was his. When before the magistrate he said that he would whistle an air, and it was agreed that if the bird took it up and followed him that should be convincing evidence. He then began to whistle "St. Patrick's Day;" the bird listened a moment, took up the air and finished it. That settled the question, and the bird was given up. It is said that the Northerner offered $1,000 for it, but this was refused.

A Nebraskan Who Knew All About Holding a Government Job.

Several years ago when John M. Thurston, the well-known Republican leader of Nebraska, was stumping that State in an important campaign, says the New York Tribune, he included its extreme western part, then a decidedly wild region, in his circuit. He was proceeding by stage to Sidney one day, when they stopped at a little station to change horses. While this important operation was going on a large, determined-looking man, whose most conspicuous article of clothing was a big revolver, approached the stage cautiously, and, while occasionally glancing nervously at a small building some hundred yards away, with a large sign of "post-office" on it, he inquired for Mr. Thurston. That gentleman made himself known, and the stranger said:

"You speak down at Sidney to-night, I hear."

"Yes, I expect to."

"I reckon I'll come down with my petition and do a little work."

"What is your petition for?" inquired the judge.

"Is there a good prospect that you will get it?"

"You bet—I'm sure of it, but I 'lowed a few more names wouldn't do no hurt. When I git it there's goin' to be the dog-gondest biggest change you ever seen in a small place."

"How's that?"

"Why, I ain't had a letter out o' that air office for over two years."

"Why not?"

"The dinged critter that has it now says he will shoot me on sight, and you bet he'd do it, too, so I lay mighty low. When a letter comes for me he nails it to the door, shoots it full o' holes, sends word for me to come and get it, and watches for me out o' the winder."

"How comes he to have such a dislike for you?"

"Claims I stole one of his steers. I didn't touch none o' his steers till he'd punched two o' my calves, and I can prove it. But jest you wait till my commission gits here and I git holt of that office. I'll wad the first letter that comes for him into my shotgun and fire it down the well. Jest wait a little, judge; he'll find that I can pound stamps with one hand and cover the front door with a six-shooter with the other jest as well as he can. My name is old Jim White, and you bet when I've got my boots on I can tie up the eastern mail with my teeth and hold a gun on the gen'ral deliv'ry and money-order winder both at the same time. Old Jim White ain't no rabbit when it comes to holdin' a guv'ment position an' lookin' out for his rights."

FEMININE VANITY.

A Girl Wants a Toe Amputated to Make Her Feet Symmetrical.

"Doctor, please cut the other toe off, won't you?"

"My dear, I can't do it. It's impossible!" And that, according to the New York World, is part of a conversation that Dr. Robert Taylor and a pretty Brookville belle have repeated almost weekly since July 4, 1886. On that date the young lady, then the daughter of a wealthy merchant, had her foot crushed in a carriage accident. Several bones had to be removed and when the foot healed the little toe was missing. It was necessary for her to have her shoes made to order, for while the original foot required a 5½ C boot the reduced member was comfortable in a 3 A. In the terrible blizzard of 1888 the retired merchant met his death, and when the girl with the nine toes came into possession of her share of property her first consideration was with Dr. Taylor regarding the possible price, but pain, it would cost to reduce her toes to a double quartette.

It so happened that the case at that time went on record as the only instance where the affliction had not terminated fatally, as traumatic tetanus or lock-jaw resulted from the wound, and the greatest skill was necessary to save the life of the patient. For nine days she endured most excruciating pains, that nothing but large doses of morphine would allay. Lock-jaw was manifest three days after the accident. The body was bent so that the head and heels almost touched and the jaws were so firmly set that a tooth had to be removed through which aperture stimulants were administered by the introduction of a tube, life being sustained by rye, brandy, punch, champagne and eggnog. All through the case the muscles of the face, arms and side twitched so violently that the constant attendance of two people was required at the bedside. Yet the remembrance of all that horrible agony seems to have remained only with the doctor, as the young lady with the odd pair of feet is not only willing to go through it again, but will take her life in her own hands and absolve the doctor of all responsibility for the sake of having her feet mates, as she puts it. And such is the extent to which a woman's vanity will lead her.

She Coppered His Bets.

A couple pretty well known in sporting circles in Boston are said to have gone to a ball match not long since, and there to have met another couple of choice spirits, another man and his wife, who were almost as much given to sporting life as themselves. In the course of the afternoon the excitement waxed apace and the gentlemen bet with a good deal of vigor. The ladies, nothing loath, followed their example, and by the time the game was concluded a considerable amount of money had been wagered. Mr. A. had all the afternoon been betting on the Boston nine, and to his great disgust he found himself the loser, the home team having failed to score a victory. On the way home he complained to his wife of hard luck, adding that he had lost more money than he knew how to spare just then.

"Oh, that is all right," his wife responded. "I won from Mrs. B. just as much as you lost to him, and I told her we'd trade the two things off and call it square."

"Why, how did that happen?" her husband asked in surprise.

"Well," was her reply, "I knew the other team was sure to win, and I sat where I could hear you bet. So every time you put up anything I covered it with Mrs. B."

"But," persisted her other half, "what in the world made you think that the out-of-town nine would win? You said beforehand that you should back the Bostons."

"Oh, yes," replied Mrs. A., with feminine logic, "but the moment I saw what a lovely straight nose that short stop had I couldn't bear to have them beaten, and so I bet on them."

The Tooth-Carpenters' Trust.

Since trusts are now so fashionable the tooth pullers, by courtesy called dentists, are the latest to combine and establish a scale of prices for their services in torturing suffering humanity. It is hinted in certain quarters, writes Ed R. Pritchard in the Arkansaw Traveler, that the dentists, doctors, clergymen and undertakers are contemplating forming a trust which, for its magnitude and far-reaching influence on humanity, will lay the Standard Oil Company or Claus Spreckles' sugar business so far in the shade that they will admit of no comparison.

A Comforting Night Cap.

"It ain't everybody I'd put to sleep in this room," said old Mrs. Jinks to the fastidious and extremely nervous young minister who was spending the night in B. at her house. "This here room is full of sacred associations to me," she went on; "my first husband died in that bed with his head on those very pillows, and poor Mr. Jinks died settin' right in that corner. Sometimes when I come into the room in the dark I think I see him settin' there still.

"My own father died layin' right on that lounge under the window. Poor pa! he was a spiritualist, and he allus said he'd appear in this room again after he died, and sometimes I'm foolish enough to look for him. If you should see anything of him to-night you'd better not tell me, for it'd be a sign to me that there was something in spiritualism, and I'd hate to think that.

"My son by my first man fell dead of heart disease right where you stand. He was a doctor, and there's two whole skeletons in that closet that belonged to him, and a half dozen skulls in that lower drawer.

"Well, good night and pleasant dreams."

Important Business.

"Oh, Papa," she said, with a blush, "young Mr. Chestnut who owns so many coal mines in Pennsylvania, is coming again this evening, and says he wants to see you on important business."

"All right, my dear," responded the old man, chucking her playfully under the chin. "I guess I know what the young man wants."

That night Mr. Chestnut came to the point at once.

"Mr. Hendricks," he said boldly, "I want to ask you if you have [illegible]"

AN ACT OF HEROISM.

It Was Performed by Charles Summers, a Railroad Yard-Master.

Charles Summers, yard-master of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road, performed an act of heroism a day or two ago which, says the Chicago Herald, demanded the exercise of nerve infinitely beyond that possessed by the average mortal. A woman was wheeling her child in a baby carriage on Ewing street where the Burlington and Alton roads cross it. Immediately after getting beyond the tracks she ran back to pick up a handkerchief she had dropped, and a prevailing wind blew the carriage back directly upon the Alton track, just as the 9:55 a. m. passenger train came along at a high rate of speed. The mother, seeing her child's peril, sprang forward as the engineer also saw the impending catastrophe. Summers, who was seated upon a pile of ties, took in the situation at a glance. Up he sprang, and dashing forward he seized the woman and threw her backward upon the ground, rushed by her, tore the child from the vehicle and fell with it over upon the cowcatcher of the engine. The baby carriage was smashed into a thousand pieces. There was scarcely a second of time between Summers' rescue of the child and his leap or fall, whichever it might be, upon the cowcatcher. In a moment or two he recovered himself sufficiently to spring lightly from the moving train and with pallid face offer the babe to its mother. The latter, however, was unconscious from the shock and did not recover for several minutes. The prompt action of this hero saved two lives at the infinite peril of his own, yet they were both strangers to him. Actions demanding less bravery have been immortalized by poets and historians, yet it is doubtful if Summers felt after it was over that he had done any thing more than was his plain duty.

SOCIETY GIRLS AT TENNIS.

Wealthy New York Beauties and Their Skill With the Racket.

The Bewildering Way in Which They Manipulate It—The Famous Players of the Leading Clubs—Modest Players and Those Who Flirt.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

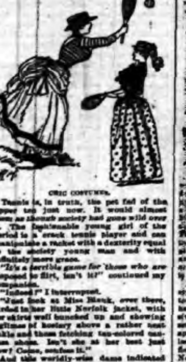
"She's a decidedly awkward creature. Just see how clumsily she handles her racket. One would almost think she had never been in a tennis court before."

And the fair but critical matron indicated with a wave of her fan, a young girl who was taking part in the game and certainly not without embarrassment. She missed play several times and her partner, a tall young fellow with a high-bred air about him, had all he could do to keep her from "fouling" at every stroke. It was evident she was a beginner.

"I should hate to give my partner so much trouble," resumed the critic by my side, as she rocked her chair lazily on the piazza from which we overlooked the players. "Every young lady ought to know tennis and indeed almost all do. I make it a point with my own daughters to have them fairly proficient in whatever amusement is popular in society during the season, and tennis is the rage just now you know. Everybody plays."

"Rather intricate for a beginner, isn't it?" I ventured to suggest.

"Not a bit more so than any other game in which young people, particularly young girls, can appear to advantage. Croquet was too ridiculously slow, you know. Besides it didn't allow any freedom of movement as tennis does. One doesn't get tired handling a racket, especially if one has a clever player for a partner."



CHIC COSTUMES.

Tennis is, in truth, the pet fad of the upper ten just now. It would almost seem as though society had gone wild over it. The fashionable young girl of the period is a crack tennis player and can manipulate a racket with a dexterity equal to the society young man and with infinitely more grace.

"It's a terrible game for those who are disposed to flirt, isn't it?" continued my companion.

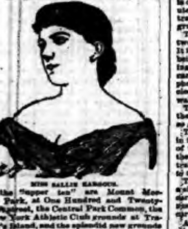
"Indeed!" I interrupted.

"Just look at Miss Blank, over there, girded in her little Norfolk jacket, with her skirts well bunched up and showing a glimpse of hosiery above a rather neat ankle and those fetching tan-colored canvas shoes. Isn't she at her best just now? Come, confess it."

And this worldly-wise dame indicated a trim, little figure, to the left of the court, serving the ball with a deliberation and skill, first to the right and then to the left, her foot on the line and her lithe and graceful body poised in an attitude such as Atalanta might have assumed when she was about to start on her famous run with the golden apple.

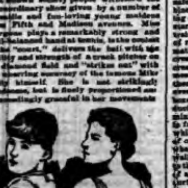
It is just a little over eight years since lawn tennis began to be affected by American girls. It was the rage in London and all through England when the first American Lawn Tennis Convention was held at the Fifth Avenue Hotel New York, in 1881, when the National Association was organized. Since that time tennis clubs have sprung up everywhere, the best known among them being the New York Tennis Club, which is now three years old, and among whose members are many well known society ladies, including some of the shining lights of the Four Hundred.

Almost any fine afternoon "the Meadows," on One Hundred and Second street, New York, west of Fifth avenue, are made a centre of attraction by the brilliant play of the young uptown fashionables who turn out in droves to share in the sport. With their striped dresses of bunting, their cute little shoes and Scotch caps, they enter the field merry as crickets, swinging their racket bags and prepared to capture the honors of the court from the gentlemen who are marshalled around in "blazers," canvass shoes and the loosest and coolest of flannels, to oppose them. And they make a pretty picture moving about swiftly and gracefully on the smoothly mown grass, or darting hither and thither in the exciting intricacies of the game. Other favorite grounds of the "upper ten" are Mount Morris Park, at One Hundred and Twenty-first street, the Central Park Common, the New York Athletic Club grounds at Travers Island, and the splendid new grounds of the Country Club at Throgg's Neck—the latter being the most exclusive of all. There are also well patronized grounds at St. George, on Staten Island, where the elite of Richmond County and many fashionable parties from New York play when the heat of town drives them to seek the sea breezes. The New York Tennis Club has its own grounds in Westchester County near Baychester village, and there game is played, not as a mere dilletante amusement, but in true scientific style, all the rules of the National Association being rigidly observed by the players. The different armories are used by some of the clubs as winter grounds.



MISS SALLIE HARGOUS.

Notable among the experts is Miss Hargous, who was interested in the recent performance at millionaire James M. Waterbury's amateur cirque near Baychester, when five hundred of New York's best known society people witnessed the extraordinary show given by a number of versatile and fun-loving young maidens from Fifth and Madison avenues. Miss Hargous plays a remarkably strong and well-balanced hand at tennis, is the combat in the "court," delivers the ball with the facility and strength of a crack pitcher on the diamond field and "strikes out" with the unerring accuracy of the famous Mike Kelly himself. She is not strikingly handsome, but is finely proportioned and exceedingly graceful in her movements.



MISS PERKINS AND MISS BARNES.

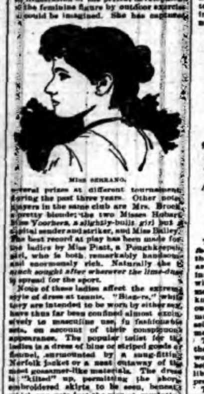
The Misses Barnes are also known as specially skillful with the racket and seldom lose a stroke. Both are distinguished by their easy carriage and grace in the field. They wear the regulation tennis suits, which show off their fine physique to advantage. Sir Ronald Cameron and sister are both noted for their skill at play and they have seldom miss an opportunity to enjoy the game. They play in the English style, which differs in some minor details from the rules laid down for American players, but they are both regarded as strong additions to any side of the "court."

Miss Marquita Serrano, the handsome daughter and heiress of the rich Cuba sugar merchant, is one of the finest players in New York and is a most attractive figure in the field. Slender and seemingly delicate, yet as agile as a kitten, she never lags in the game, and is a keen sportswoman and a dangerous opponent. She is equally clever either in a three-handed or a four-handed game, and when the field is large she shines by contrast with the weaker players.

The Misses Potter, daughters of Howard N. Potter, and near relatives of Bishop Potter, are both brilliant players and are beautiful girls, besides.

Miss Griswold, whose brother is a noted amateur horseman and patron of athletic sports, is another remarkably handsome figure in the tennis court. Miss Breese, a rich young heiress, with the contour and physique of a Cleopatra, great lambent, dusky eyes, and a soft, peach-like complexion, is one of the queens of the field and is a most attractive figure behind a tennis net. Her playing is a combination of rare skill and gracefulness. The Misses Hoyt and Morgan, Miss Bronson, sister of Howard and Frederic Bronson, and ex-Mayor Hewitt's daughters are also notable players. The Misses Hewitt are equally at home with the violin or tennis racket. Still another young lady who plays a remarkably strong game is Miss Perkins, the daughter of a wealthy retired merchant, whose sweet face and winning ways and trim lithe figure, while not conspicuous in the field, is nevertheless hailed by the party on whose side she is enlisted for the tourney.

One of the crack players of the New York Tennis Club is Mrs. H. G. Badgeley, the handsome wife of a prominent Wall street broker. She is possessed of a splendid physique, is a tireless player, and as fine an illustration of the perfect development of the feminine figure by outdoor exercise could be imagined. She has captured several prizes at different tournaments during the past three years. Other noted players in the same club are Mrs. Brock, a pretty blonde; the two Misses Hobart, Miss Voorhees, a slightly-built girl but a capital sender and striker, and Miss Bailey. The best record at play has been made for the ladies by Miss Piatt, a Poughkeepsie girl, who is both remarkably handsome and enormously rich. Naturally she is much sought after wherever the lime-dust is spread for the sport.



MISS SERRANO.

None of these ladies affect the extreme style of dress at tennis. "Blazers," while they are intended to be worn by either sex, have thus far been confined almost exclusively to masculine use, in fashionable sets, on account of their conspicuous appearance. The popular toilet for the ladies is a dress of blue or striped goods or flannel, surmounted by a snug-fitting Norfolk jacket or a neat cutaway of the most gossamer-like materials. The dress is "kilted" up, permitting the short embroidered skirts to be seen, beneath which one gets just the merest revelation of a cool-looking silken stocking above the dainty little rubber-soled tennis shoes, or canvass slippers. The dress must fit snugly, yet so as to permit the freest action of the limbs.

The game of lawn tennis is now so popular that it does not need description here. Complete equipments vary in cost from $12 to $50, the latter including everything necessary for the enjoyment of a four-handed game in the most approved way. Much impetus has been given to tennis by such wealthy sporting amateurs as the Rollins, the Heckshers, Livingston, Beekmans (who has invented and patented a racket now called the Beekman) and others.

TIME ANNIHILATED.

Trains Moving at the Rate of Three Miles a Minute.

A Bright Streak of Red Flying Through Space—The Weems Transit System—An Electro-Automatic Railroad of Great Interest.

The Weems railway system, incorporated under the name of the Electro-Automatic Transit Company, of Baltimore, has patented a multiplicity of electrical and mechanical appliances as a preliminary to putting the system regularly to work whenever required.

By this electro-automatic arrangement it is claimed that a speed of three miles a minute can be attained and maintained on level tracks, and two miles a minute on heavy grades and curves.

The motor car is eighteen feet long and two and one-half feet square at each end. It is pointed in front, the wedge or point being below the longitudinal center, adjusting it to the air pressure, thus keeping the car down to the track. To reduce atmospheric friction to a minimum all wheels and electrical appliances are placed within the walls of the cars.

The mail and express cars are telescoped in forming a train, the former into the end of the motor car, and the latter into that of the one preceding it, forming a flexible train of cars, offering an unbroken surface to the air.

The rear end of the rear car is pointed in a similar manner to the front of the motor car, thus preventing any suction as the train pushes on its way. The motor may pull one car or a train of cars.

All trains will be controlled from a generating station, where will be placed an electrical generating plant. Electrical brakes are to be used, and trains are started, stopped, speed lessened and backed at will from the station.

Special appliances will inform the operator in charge of the generating station of the exact location of the train from the time it leaves or passes any given point until it reaches its destination.

The patents of the company number one hundred and forty-three in the United States and the principal countries of the world, covering the vital details of this novel system.

The principles patented involve special form of rail, making it impossible for trains to jump the track at any rate of speed; form of electric safety rail, carrying the out-going current and returning the same on the same rail (this rail can be crossed by pedestrians or vehicles with perfect safety); form of conductors and rails combined, with insulation of the same for carrying currents over long distances; means of starting, stopping, backing and controlling trains from the generating stations; method of regulating the electrical current automatically on trains while in motion, increasing the power in ascending and decreasing the same in descending grades; means whereby trains automatically register themselves at every station as they pass every mile track; form of journals and boxes for fast speed to avoid heating; reducing the air pressure at high speed to a minimum by pointed cars splitting the air in front and preventing suction in the rear while in transit; reducing the cross-section of cars to a minimum and enclosing the wheels and electrical equipment within the walls of the same to offer as little resistance to the air as possible; telescoping the cars of a train to present to the air an unbroken surface; special switch for rails; keeping the center of gravity of the whole train below the axles.

Patents have also been secured for a passenger system which applies to the conversion of existing steam railroads into electric railroads.

A series of experiments have been made at Laurel, Md., to show what the Weems railway system will do.

This experimental line is a circuit of exactly two miles. Over this route there are seventy-nine changes of grades, some of them very heavy, even to the extent of 100 feet to the mile.

It is claimed that at this experimental station two miles per minute are made around a heavy curve, or the equivalent of 180 miles an hour, or three miles a minute on a level track.

A visitor to this experimental station sees many things to surprise him, says the Baltimore Sun. There are no extensive works, and the motor car, when it comes out from under its shed, in obedience to the will of the engineer in the distant plant building where the electric dynamo generates the current, moves deliberately, slowly and with an absence of all sound.

This cigar shaped car, painted a bright red and moving sharp end foremost, at first sight does not seem a wonderful thing as it goes quietly along the track, but later, when the engineer at the dynamo gets on more power, or as a steam-car man would say, more steam, and the creeping thing on the ground hastens its movements until it fairly flies, and becomes a moving speck of red, spectators feel the progress being made in applied science and talk of the wonders of electricity, and the great things it will accomplish in the active affairs of life in the near future.

UPON WHAT MEAT?

The Sort of Books That Statesmen Feed on.

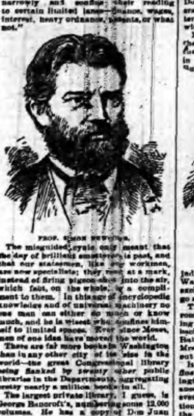
A Great Book City—Bancroft's Library—Mrs. Cleveland's Tastes—Hoar and Sumner—Judge Bradley as an Inventor—The Cabinet Ladies.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

"What do our Supreme Judges and Cabinet Ministers and Congressmen read?" I asked one of the best-known booksellers in Washington.

"They don't read anything!" he exclaimed with a sniff of disgust, pushing his fingers through his grey hair.

"To be more accurate and more explicit," he explained, "our law-makers do not read broadly, as the statesmen of former generations did. They read narrowly and confine their reading to certain limited lines—finance, wages, interest, heavy ordnance, patents, or what not."



PROF. SIMON NEWCOMB.

The misguided cynic only meant that the day of brilliant amateurs is past, and that our statesmen, like our workmen, are now specialists; they read at a mark, instead of firing pigeon-shot into the air, which fact, on the whole, is a compliment to them. In this age of encyclopedic knowledge and of universal machinery no one man can either do much or know much, and he is wisest who confines himself to limited spaces. Ever since Moses, men of one idea have moved the world.

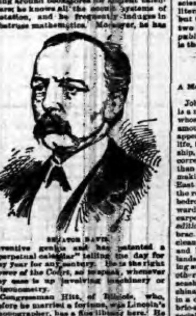
There are far more books in Washington than in any other city of its size in the world—the great Congressional library being flanked by twenty other public libraries in the Departments, aggregating pretty nearly a million books in all.

The largest private library, I guess, is George Bancroft's, numbering some 12,000 volumes. He has a copy of Don Juan which Lord Byron gave him with an autographic note pasted in it, and he has poems which Wordsworth gave him. He is an old man and reads no more.

Mrs. Cleveland stirred up the bookstores here with her passion for good books. She entertained her callers by deftly turning the conversation upon books, and ascertaining what there was worth reading that she had missed. I once mentioned "Lorna Doone" to her, and with her permission sent it to the White House. The next time I saw her was at a crowded diplomatic reception, but she found time to say: "Thanks! It is one of the great books of the world." Later, my wife called her attention to "Little Lord Fauntleroy," and sent the book to her. Mrs. Cleveland returned it the next day with a note in which she said: "You know from your own experience how much I have enjoyed the reading of it. I finished it five minutes ago, with tears very near in my eyes for the sweet, manly little heir to the Earldom of Dorincourt."

Judge Hoar is probably the best scholar at all points there is in the Senate. He is a great reader, a good Greek, Latin and French scholar, and an extensively informed man in every direction. In thoroughness he is the equal of that omnivorous reader, his predecessor, Charles Sumner. Sumner was more universally accomplished, having made a study of French, Italian and German literature, of engraving and the fine arts; but it must be aded that Hoar is far more accurate than Sumner, who was careless in citations and whose speeches abounded in errors of fact. The senior Senator from Massachusetts has a large and very select library, especially strong in history and biography.

The private library that stands next to Bancroft's numerically is, I think, that of Judge Bradley, of the Supreme Court. His books run to law, history, mechanics, high mathematics and rare old tomes. He has the famous first folio of Shakespeare, a number of editions of his works, and everything of importance ever written about the great poet. He is always grubbing around bookstores for ancient calendars; he knows all the occult systems of notation, and he frequently indulges in abstruse mathematics. Moreover, he has inventive genius and has patented a "perpetual calendar" telling the day for any year for any century. He is the right bower of the Court, so to speak, whenever any case is up involving machinery or trigonometry.



SENATOR DAVIS.

Congressman Hitt, of Illinois, who, before he married a fortune, was Lincoln's phonographer, has a fine library here. He possesses scholarly acquisitions and a culture and taste quite exceptional in the House. He is fond of rare and handsome editions in tree calf and old illuminated volumes. He probably reads more French and German books, especially novels, than any other member of either House, not excepting his intimate friend, Phelps.

Hitt finds a rival in John Hay, as a snapper-up of luxurious editions, nothing being too sumptuous for the poet. Hay's library is worth a visit, for it is the handsomest in Washington, quite fitted to his superb mansion opposite the White House. It is on the ground floor, and its ceiling is heavily panelled in old oak with circular discs which sparkle under the soft light of the chandeliers as if sprayed with gold dust. The books are in low cases all around the walls, forming a rich and decorative base for the [illegible] paintings above and a harmonious frame for the great carved oaken desk in the middle of the room. Hay delights in rare editions of Don Quixote and Thackeray, of Omar Khayyam, and the Vedas, and the Zend Avesta, and Elihu Vedder's [illegible], and books written and printed on Vellum. He is a good French and German scholar, reading and speaking both, as does Mrs. Hay, and by the way there is scarcely a noted dwelling in Washington in which French novels are not read.

One of the most discriminating readers of the Senate is Cush. K. Davis, of Minnesota. He is a good Latin scholar and doesn't permit his knowledge to rust; he is well acquainted with the French and German languages and literatures; is an expert on Shakespeare, and has a more comprehensive knowledge of the literature of the Napoleonic wars than any other Congressman, perhaps, than any other American.

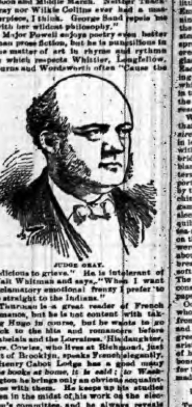
Prof. Simon Newcomb, one of the country's most renowned scientists, has his library in his wife's great parlor, his desk occupying a large bay window. Few literary workers could avoid being out of place in such elegant surroundings, but Prof. Newcomb keeps his desk marvelously neat. His library is largely composed of mathematics and political economy, and "A Plain Man's View of the Labor Question" (one of the twenty books he has written) is an admirably clear treatise and has a very large circulation.

Prof. Lester F. Ward, who stands at the head of the paleontologists of the country, replied to my question "What do you read?" by saying "I read nothing but what my work requires me to read. I never read novels or poetry. Before taking the time to read any book I thoroughly canvass the necessity for it, get the opinions of others who have read it, and satisfy my-self that it is indispensable. And I never permit myself to read a translation. If I conclude to read a book written in a tongue unknown to me, I go and study the language for the purpose."

Major J. W. Powell, Director of the Geological Survey, in answer to a question as to his favorite novels, said:

"Here are the dozen preferred. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, Vicar of Wakefield, A Man Made of Money, Douglas Jerrold, Ivanhoe, David Copperfield, The Three Guardsmen, Les Miserables, (if you could cut out Hugo's preaching, this book would be grand), Uncle Tom's Cabin, The Cloister and Hearth, A Strange Story, Lorna Doone and Middle March. Neither Thackeray nor Wilkie Collins ever had a masterpiece, I think. George Sand repels me with her wildest philosophy."

Major Powell enjoys poetry even better than prose fiction, but he is punctilious in the matter of art in rhyme and rythms in which respects Whittier, Longfellow, Burns and Wordsworth often "Cause the judicious to grieve." He is intolerant of Walt Whitman and says, "When I want exclamatory emotional frenzy I prefer to go straight to the Indians."



JUDGE GRAY.

Thurman is a great reader of French romance, but he is not content with taking Hugo in course, but he wants to go back to the bits and romancers before Rabelais and the Lorraines. His daughter, Mrs. Cowles, who lives at Richmond, just out of Brooklyn, speaks French elegantly.

Henry Cabot Lodge has a good many fine books at home, it is said; to Washington he brings only an obvious acquaintance with them. He keeps up his studies even in the midst of his work on the election's committee, and he always reveals the possession of a fine literary taste and even skill—the art of putting things.

Senator Berry's loss of a leg in the army made a great reader and student of him. His tendencies are towards novel reading and he especially likes translations—Hugo and Balzac, promptly.

Senator Sherman has a finely stocked library of standard books, but he practices the theory of Gladstone, "never read a book till it is a year old." He buys all rare and valuable books on finance and informs himself of their contents. He knows the history of prices, and has a theory of his own about what creates values.

Judge Lamar lost his fine library during the war, but he is rebuilding it with immense industry and discrimination. He possesses a keen, quick and penetrating intellect, well stored with classic traditions.

Judge Gray, also of the Supreme Court, has a Massachusetts love of luxury, and he is found in the amiable emulation for the possession of handsomely printed and bound books. When the edition de luxe is in the market it finds in Judge Gray an admirer. He reads French "with avidity," like Miss Repplier, and it is whispered that he has drawn from the Congressional Library a thousand French novels of the better class in the last five years.

The ladies of the present Cabinet circle seem quite able to hold their own in society, but of their bookish tendencies little is yet known in Washington. Mrs. Windom, living with her family in the elegant mansion of Prof. Gardner Hubbard, finds herself surrounded with an immense library, containing some of the rarest of antique volumes.

The wife of Gen. Noble, Secretary of the Interior, has given Washington a glimpse of her only at the two or three receptions of the spring. It found her agreeable and prepossessing; but she is said to be also scholarly, and to have a well defined ambition to know something of the world's best books. In St. Louis, the Noble household has been a sort of intellectual and literary centre, where thoughtful people of congenial tastes meet to consider the latest utterance concerning science, art, philosophy or imaginative literature. Mrs. Noble has no children, but will be accompanied in Washington by two brilliant sisters, one of whom has published a book and the other of whom is the wife of one of our wealthy citizens.

POOR JOHN ASTOR.

A Member of the Wealthy Family Who Has Had Hard Luck.

John Astor, of 418 East Sixteenth street, is a member of the famous Astor family, whose aggregated wealth in New York amounts to some $300,000,000. John Astor's appearance, education, business and mode of life, however, give no indication of the kinship, writes the Boston Herald's New York correspondent. His income is rarely more than $8 or $9 a week, and he earns it by making cigars nine hours every day in an East side factory. He lives in two rooms in the rear of a crowded tenement house. His bedroom is little larger than an ordinary wardrobe. In his best room are no velvet carpets, nor old masters' pictures, nor editions of books de luxe, nor Italian bric-a-brac. A stout rag carpet half covers the clean hemlock floor. A few tea chromos and half a dozen cheap prints of German landscapes are on the walls. A small cooking stove occupies the space reserved by the other Astors for a tiled fireplace. Some big seashells on the mantlepiece, and a stone china wash-bowl and pitcher on a pine shelf in a corner are the only substitutes for bric-a-brac. A copy of Volks-Zeitung, the socialistic newspaper of New York, is about the only bit of reading which finds its way into the room. Altogether, the furniture of Mr. Astor's two little apartments would not bring half enough at auction to buy the brown stone steps before the residence of John J. Astor on Fifth avenue.

The writer found Mr. Astor in his shirt sleeves at the window of his best room. There was a three-quart "growler" on the table before him, a corncob pipe in his mouth and the Volks-Zeitung on his knee. His shirt was not clean. He recited his claims to a place in Mr. McAllister's "Four Hundred," laboriously, wearily, unwillingly and exactly. Though he owns but a very small twig of the Astor family tree, he knows just where the twig is and how it grew. His grandfather and the original John Jacob Astor were first cousins, and lived within a few rods of each other many years ago in Walldorf, Baden. They and their families were as thoroughly intimate as relatives in Germany usually are. John Jacob Astor came to America before John Astor was born. In 1829 John Astor's father sent him from Walldorf to New York, with the admonition that he should seek the help of his relatives here, and make money as they had made it.

"I have been in New York ever since," said John Astor, slowly. "I have seen John J. Astor twice, once in his summer garden and once in his office. The last time he gave me five dollars. The Astors here don't know me, and I don't know them."

In the early part of the seventies John Astor was well-to-do. He owned a cigar store with a good trade. He fell ill, however, and his business went to pieces. It was shortly before he was sold out in 1876, he says, when John J. Astor helped him with a five-dollar bill. For the last twelve years he has been a journeyman cigar-maker. He is phenomenally phlegmatic. One evening early in this month, when he returned home from work, his wife told him she had taken a dose of Paris green. He listened to her story, and then went to bed. The next morning he summoned a doctor, shortly before she died. His bad luck has left its mark upon him. Though but fifty-six years old, he looks like a man of seventy. His mustache and side whiskers are thin and gray. His broad shoulders are bent. He moves slowly and wearily. His large, deep-set eyes are expressionless of interest or emotion. Altogether, he is a discouraged, hard-working, honest man, with as little interest in the world as the world has in him.

CANINE BIRTHDAY PARTY.

Well-Bred Dogs Who Enjoyed a Special Fashionable Reception.

A canine party doesn't begin to cost as much as a lady's afternoon reception, and it is ever so much jollier, says the New York World. When the petted terrier has a birthday cards are sent out to every lady on his mistress' visiting list who keeps a chamber in her heart for a favorite pug or skye, and the replies are written in the dog's name. Gifts are imperative, whether the invitation is accepted or regretted. If doggie hasn't any maid, or if he is too precious to be trusted in strange hands, "mamma" accompanies him to the birthday in person.

Not long ago Mrs. Eugene Clark, of West Twenty-eighth street, whose dogs have never entered a kennel club exhibition without capturing a desirable prize, gave a canine party that will serve as a model for some months to come. The host, a most sagacious little animal, born in the far away Japanese Empire, was assisted in receiving his canine friends by an elder cousin, also from the Orient. One lay in a black walnut bedstead, dressed in a white lace counterpane spread over rose-colored satin, and the honored dog stood at the entrance of a real glass house lined with blue silk cushions. Each guest on arriving entered the drawing-room carrying his birthday present, which he laid before the delighted host, who in turn made himself agreeable by saluting the donor and removing the gift to a corner reserved for that purpose.

What were the tributes? Every thing that the heart of a well-bred dog could desire—but juicy bones. There were collars in leather, silver and worsted work, hung with little silver bells and bright ribbons; bridles of steel, bronze and sterling silver; blankets embroidered in Kensington patterns; shell combs and ivory brushes; imported soaps; porcelain bath-tubs; balls by the dozen; drinking bowls of decorated china; feeding pans of German plate; games, with rats attached; fancy pillows; sleeping and traveling baskets, lined with quilted silk; and last of all, bouquets of tea-roses, which the honored Kito devoured on the spot. After the reception the dogs were taken to the dining-room, seated about the table on stools and regaled on bread and milk. For dessert there were soft cream candies, ice-cream and cake. The favors were taken from a game, and consisted of Japanese balls wrapped in paper napkins.

Ootah, the custard and white beauty, in whose honor the party was given, came from the private kennels of the Mikado, and Kioto, his foster-brother, has a pedigree that ranks him in the first row of aristocratic dogdom. Mrs. Clark is proud of her pets and keeps them in fresh ribbons and musical bells, and sends them out for their constitutionals with a bridle-rein made of linked silver.

Points for the Housewife.

1. Salt curdles milk and should not be added until the dish is prepared.

2. Clean boiling water will remove fruit and tea stains.

3. Ripe tomatoes will remove ink and other stains from white cloth, and also from the hands.

4. A tablespoonful of turpentine added while boiling clothes will add to the whitening process.

5. Boiled starch is much improved by the addition of a little dissolved gum arabic.

6. Beeswax and salt will make rusty flatirons as clean and smooth as glass.

8. Kerosene will soften boots and shoes when hardened with water and render them pliable.

9. Kerosene will make tea kettles as bright as new; saturate a woolen rag and rub with it.

10. Cool rain water and soda will remove machine grease from washable fabrics.

Laura Bridgman and the Dictionary.

The late Laura Bridgman, blind, deaf and dumb, was fond of reading the dictionary. This book she would peruse by the hour, and herein she showed her wisdom, since the exact meaning of the words and the correct use of synonyms certainly present very great difficulties to a person in her condition. With orthography she had no difficulty, and would correct any one who misspelled a word. Fairy stories she did not care for; she said they were not true. She was fond of fun, and never outgrew her love of innocent frolic.

SHIPWRECKS.

Sad indeed is it to see a noble ship, beautifully modeled, fully equipped and richly freighted, thrown a broken and helpless wreck upon an unfriendly shore.

Yet there are many more harrowing sights than that, aye, far sadder to witness and contemplate.

The most lamentable of all shipwrecks is the destruction of moral character, and our country at the present time is strewn therewith.

Scarce a week passes that the journals of the day do not chronicle financial embezzlements, defalcations, for breaches of trust, of various kinds and amounts, and perpetrated by men deemed worthy of public and private confidence, but who, yielding to temptation, took the one fatal step that is sure to lead downward to dishonor and ruin, finally plunging not only themselves, but families and friends, into hopeless misery.

It is a staggering fact.

Doubtless the modern system of fast living and reckless money seeking is to a great extent the noxious seed from whence springs such a deplorable harvest.

Yet, while that is unquestionably the truth, it does not furnish a particle of excuse.

No man has the right to steal, or in other words appropriate to his own use the property of others.

Dishonesty, whether large or small, public or private, is the treacherous reef whereon such multitudes of human reputations have been and are being shattered into fragments.

Avoid its deadly peril!

The first wrong act unlocks the door of danger. Scores of men holding positions of financial responsibility, and standing well in society, vainly thinking they could refund at pleasure and finding it easy to misuse money or its equivalent, have carried on and enlarged operations of thievery, until confronted with ruined character, ignominious flight, or a felon's cell.

Robbery like murder will out.

Were men strictly honest, at all times and under all circumstances, what blessed results would ensue.

Honesty is the need of the age, not vague profession, but substantive reality.

Honesty in places of financial trusts.

Honesty in public offices.

Honesty in political affairs.

Honesty in business transactions.

Honesty ought to be preached from pulpits, urged from platforms, advocated by the press, and taught as a saving virtue in all the schools of the land.

A New Electrical Contrivance.

The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company is experimenting with an electrical apparatus which, it is claimed, will prevent a locomotive slipping on grades. The invention is the idea of a Baltimore party and is being placed on coal engine 447 in the machine shops in Reading. The electricity is generated by a small dynamo, which is run by the engine. The current thus generated is passed around the driving wheels and thence to the rails, which become magnetized, and the drivers are prevented from slipping. It is claimed that a locomotive can haul as many cars up grade with the attachment as on a level.

If the experiment proves satisfactory the invention will no doubt be adopted by the Central Railroad.

Sad Results of the Floods.

The heavy rains of the past weeks caused much damage throughout the State, in the loss of crops. In some sections, as told in THE PRESS, large quantities of hay and oats were cut, but had not been gathered when the storm commenced. In low places the fields were covered with water, and the crops were washed about the fields. Much of the hay and oats caught in this condition, is considered by some of the farmers to be worthless, and they report that they will not attempt to gather it.

But its an ill rain that brings nobody good, and many will be glad to hear that up in the Vernon valley the onion fields were badly washed, and in places the water was knee deep. This was also the case on the Great Meadows in Warren county. The onion raisers in those districts say they will lose thousands of bushels, in fact, that the season's crop is "torn through its heart."

S. W. R. Thinks the Crescent Common Have the Pull.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE DAILY PRESS:—I have read in your paper a great deal recently relative to water and sewerage in Plainfield. I am willing to confess my ignorance regarding the laws of your State pertaining to sewage, but it seems to me remarkably strange that as a previous Council had the power to grant a franchise to private corporations to build sewers, why the present Council hasn't the same power? The North avenue and Front street sewer was built by the New Jersey Central Railroad Company, by permission from the Common Council granting them the privilege. Now did that Council commit an overt act? Of course it was done by the advice of their attorney, and was their attorney so unsophisticated in the law as to allow that Council to commit so gross an error, or have there been new laws enacted by the State Legislature annulling such powers as did then exist?

Will the present corporation counsel publish wherein he finds his decision prohibiting this present Council from granting a franchise to any private party or parties, as long as the city is saved harmless from expense therefrom. Does it become necessary to make two bites of the plum in order to retain the taste? Why not grant both water and sewerage? Both are necessary and cannot be done too soon for the growth of the city.

Perhaps some one has a big pull on the proposed business? Yours respectfully,

G. W. R.

Base Ball Bulletin.

Mr. R. J. Shaw, the druggist, has a base ball bulletin posted on the window of his store on East Front street, every evening, announcing the results of the day's games played in various parts of the country. This bit of enterprise on the part of Mr. Shaw is appreciated by the people in general.

A Nurses' Registry.

The Plainfield Medical Association has arranged for a registry of nurses, at Reynolds' drug store, corner of Park and North avenue. All nurses—both men and women—are advised to place their names on this register, which the public will find convenient to consult when wanting nurses.

It Can't be Done.

The case against Joseph Sullivan who is charged with keeping one of the sixty-three unlicensed liquor-selling places in Plainfield, was again adjourned, Monday afternoon.

Chief Carey, however, says: "It's a long lane that has no turning," and he still lives in hopes of the accomplishment of that utter impossibility—the stopping of the sale of liquor by refusing licenses.

Beat the Record.

One of the six homing pigeons belonging to Mr. Chas. Faber of North Plainfield, which were liberated at Charlotte, N. C., on Saturday at 5.30 A. M., reached its loft on Sunday at 4.15 P. M., having traveled a distance of about 525 miles. The bird is a blue checker, numbered "N.," and is known as "Rain Crow." Mr. Faber is anxiously awaiting some tidings from his five other birds. Saturday's fly beats last year's record by about a day.

The Record Broken.

At the Olympic bowling alley on Wednesday, Mr. John D. White scored 256 points, thereby beating all previous records at bowling since the alley has been in operation. Following is a list of those who have scored 200 and over:

J. D. White	256	C. H. Borden	211
[illegible] Browen	230	Walter Bird	210
[illegible] Willett	231	Al. Vail	209
C. VanWinkle	227	Geo. Swain	209
[illegible] A. Reed	219	R. G. Smith	205
[illegible] W. Drayton	214	Howard Tool	209
A. [illegible] Wyckoff	213	P. VanAlstyne	203

Broke His Own Arm Pitching.

Fred Moffet who was pitching in a game at the ring, Saturday afternoon, broke his arm just above the elbow while delivering the ball.

The unfortunate young man was about 19 years of age, and a very clever pitcher. As he threw the ball a sharp snap was heard, and Moffett called out, "Who struck me?" Just then his arm swung around, and his hand hanging loosely struck him in the back.

Dr. Jones, of Basking Ridge, set the bone which was found to be entirely broken in two. Moffett will pitch no more.

Two Sudden Deaths at Bound Brook.

John Moffett, a mason by trade, was found dead in bed Sunday morning, at the residence in Bound Brook of his son-in-law, Thomas Davenport.

John Holak, a Polander, was killed Saturday, at Middlebrook, on the Central Railroad. His remains were brought to Bound Brook and H. G. Wagoner, the county physician, notified. Holak was a married man and was on his way from the Pennsylvania coal regions to New York city. His remains were buried by Undertaker Bush in the Bound Brook cemetery.

A Gifted Preacher.

A large congregation gathered Sunday at the Crescent Avenue church, to listen to the Rev. R. S. Holmes, formerly of this city, and now pastor of a large church in Warren, Pa. His text was: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." He was listened to with the greatest attention by the audience, and his sermon was pronounced by many to be the best interpretation of the text ever heard. Mr. Holmes' sermon in the evening was equally as good. He is a gifted speaker, and the people of Warren are to be congratulated on their possession of him.

[illegible] Water is in the Valley [illegible]

"Like good news from a far country," etc., etc.! If you have friends and relatives residing at a distance you must know how anxious they are to hear from the old home." You do not always have time to write. If you desire to gratify their wishes and make them think of you continually have THE PRESS sent to them by mail. It will cost you but $5 and you would willingly spend that amount for their pleasure at any time. Our list of out-of-town subscriptions is already large, the paper reaching nearly every State in the Union. THE PRESS will also be left at your door for ten cents a week.

[illegible] Good Hand.

(From the Flemington Republican.)

W. R. Love, the Three Bridges caterer, has again demonstrated his ability as a manager of a clam bake. The one he gave last Thursday on Factor Island was a great success. The clams were of exceedingly fine flavor and nicely baked by "[illegible]" Cole. They could not have been better. The afternoon attendance was not large, and that is where the public missed it, for the Clinton Band was present and rendered plenty of rare music. In the evening the attendance was pretty good, and there was much dancing, that seemed to be highly enjoyed by the young folks. Music by Prof. Fraser's orchestra from Plainfield. The Professor has a great head for conducting a dance. We think that all were satisfied with the entertainment.

[illegible] Big Catch.

The beauty and healthfulness of Lake Hopatcong is attracting many Summer guests to its shores, and the hotels and cottages are filled with boarders who are enjoying the pleasures afforded at that most beautiful place. The evenings are cool and delightful and the fishing is beginning to improve.

Among the most notable catches this season, was that of Mr. Thos. J. Nicholl of Fanwood, on Saturday afternoon, while fishing in the Lake with Dr. S. P. Harned and his son of Woodbridge, N. J. Tom succeeded in capturing a black bass weighing 5½ pounds on a light fly rod. The Doctor also succeeded in landing a 4½ pound bass.

The fish were served up at the cottage of Mrs. James Vanorver, where the party are stopping. This cottage has become a popular resort on account of its home-like accommodations and reasonable charges.

Wild Man at Piscataway.

For several weeks past, a man supposed to be of the wild species has been terrorizing the women of Piscatawaytown, a small hamlet a few miles south of this city, and on Saturday night a search was made for the unknown man.

A party of seven, led by Mr. W. H. Brokaw, started for Dunham's Hill, where the stranger had been seen to frequently enter a small stretch of woodland and disappear. The search closed [illegible] and the searchers had no difficulty in finding the dilapidated hut in which the man had slept.

There was evidence that the place had been occupied, but no trace of the stranger could be found. He had disappeared and took with him a large bundle of clothing which he had been seen to carry.

The [illegible] man is described as being [illegible] of years old, with a [illegible] [illegible] of features. He has visited almost every farm house in the village during the absence of the men and terrorized the families by demanding food.

The basis of representation will be one delegate for each two hundred Democratic votes cast at the Gubernatorial election of 1886, and one for each fraction of the same over one hundred; but each ward and township shall be entitled to at least one delegate.

George Pfeiffer, Benj. F. Lee, James Inglis, Jr., Gottfried Krueger, Daniel F. Greene, Manning Freeman, Joseph W. Ballantine, Holloway W. Hunt, James Smith, Jr., John Ekstein, Jas. H. Blackwell, Democratic State committee.

Somerset County Freeholders.

A special meeting of the Board of Freeholders of Somerset county was held at North Plainfield, on August 6, to take action in repairing the damages caused by the recent floods there. After an inspection of the damages the Board met at Blake's Hotel and directed that repairs should be made as follows:

The bridge near John Stine's to be rebuilt; to be an A truss, iron stringer, ten feet longer and abutments two feet higher than the former one; material for the abutment and wing walls to be discretionary with the committee.

The bridge at Rockview avenue is to be of iron, 60 feet span, 16 feet roadway, new abutments and wing wall.

The bridge on the extension of Grove street is not to be repaired for the present.

Mr. Jones with the committee is to proceed to repair the bridge over Green Brook near Mr. John F. Wilcox's. The material in the wrecked bridges is to be collected and used in the repairs as far as possible.

The members of the committee are Messrs Jones, Bullman, Wyckoff, Kirch and Staats.

We Are the People's.

Saturday's issue of THE PRESS published eighteen notices of different church services for the following day, while Saturday's News contained but nine. Verily the evidence that we are the people's only newspaper, is varied, extended and plain to see.

No Game for Somerville Yet.

As the matter now stands—Plainfield's ball team have won a game, and the New Yorks have one. The record is:

	WON	LOST	PERCENTAGE
New York	1	0	100
Plainfield	1	1	50
Somerville	0	1	0

Coming Ball Games.

That strong team of amateur ball players, the Buttermilks of New York, will play the Crescent nine on the Bowling Club's grounds, next Saturday afternoon. Gately and Hayden will probably be the home team's battery.

The fat men in all the glory of their razzle-dazzle uniforms, will play the thin men, of this city, on the LaGrande avenue grounds, Thursday afternoon, Aug. 22. It will be the game of the season.

Freeholders' Proceedings.

The members of the Union County Board of Chosen Freeholders met at Elizabeth Monday, and received the report of the Committee on Bridges, with reference to the damage done by the recent flood. The total number of bridges, large and small, washed away by the high water, is about 20, and the total loss to the county, including the damage to bridges, washouts, roads, etc., will aggregate about $30,000.

A Sweet and Cultured Vocalist.

During the past two weeks, the guests of Hotel Netherwood have been favored with the presence of Miss Clara Josephine Mears, a graduate of the Cincinnati College of Music, whom some of THE PRESS readers were so favored as to hear at Trinity Reformed church, during the morning service of Aug. 4.

Miss Mears evinces the highest musical culture, and is equally well versed in rendering operatic and classical selections, Italian and English, and in Grand Oratorio, or the more simple ballads. She proposes to spend the coming season in New York, and THE PRESS prophesies a successful future for her.

Only One in Two Thousand Complains.

THE PRESS received too late for publication, Monday, a complaint from Dr. W. E. Mattison of North Plainfield. He asserts in substance that he was refused a 15 cent ticket at the ball grounds Saturday, and was compelled to pay 25 cents for general admission and a grand stand on his feet.

Twelve hundred seats were provided by the management, Saturday, and if there were many who came afterwards and were compelled to stand, they all—except possibly Dr. Mattison—realized at a glance what an extraordinary occasion it was, and appreciated the fact that the management had done its best.

As to the extra charge our correspondent claims he was compelled to pay—it is positively denied by the gentleman who sold Dr. Mattison. The former tells the PRESS reporter that the doctor said he wanted a good place and a seat, and he was then told he must pay twenty-five cents.

Any one who is not satisfied can at any of the ball games get his money back by asking for it before the second innings commences.

$5,000 Worth of Clothing will Probably be Decided To-Night.

$5,000 is not a very extraordinary amount of Clothing for Watson & Co. to sell on a Saturday, but it is a very large amount even for them to sell at this off-season of the year when you consider that their garments are now sold at about half price, yet this amount will probably be exceeded to-night, as the rush for bargains all the week shows that the public fully understand that chances to get elegant Cut garments at half rates will soon close out the last garment that Watson & Co have to sell. Figure up the immense amount of Clothing it takes to supply even one day's sales at the prices that Watson & Co. are now selling at. It takes 1,000 pair of pants at $3 a pair to amount to $3,000, 100 suits at $10 each to make $1,000 more, and nearly 100 Worsted Coats and Vests at $8 and $2.50 for foreign goods, or $10 and $3 for American goods to make the sales up to $5,000.

Of course other goods like Boys' Clothing, Serge Suits and Prince Alberts are sold daily, but it is the broken lots of $7, $6 and $5 pantaloons, now closing at $3 a pair; the pick of their elegant Cassimere Suits at $10, and the fine Worsted Coats and Vests made by their bile Custom tailors at $8 and $2.50 for foreign goods and $10 and $3 for American goods that is making the rush of business you see when you pass the corner of Broad and Market streets and draw the crowd around the windows of Watson & Co. to see the samples of those elegant garments which so many are buying and which soon will be gone. Avoid future regrets by securing some bargain for yourself at this great mark-down sale, as you can now buy the elegant hand-cut garments of Watson & Co. lower than the usual Machine Cut Clothing is sold for, at least don't spend your money until you see, and remember this week will cut up all the odd patterns in their Custom Department, which go in with the rest of their broken lots of stiff and satin trimmed Pantaloons at $3 a pair. Better to-night if they are not doing more business than all the Clothing Stores in the city combined.—Newark Press.

Watch if the Ball is Up.

Whenever there is a ball game on the home grounds, the management of the Crescent nine will run out a flag from the corner window of THE PRESS composing rooms across Park avenue at North, the same as was displayed last Saturday afternoon. The flag is white, with a round red center.

Falls On the City.

The fifty dollars in cash which the Board of Freeholders decided to contribute toward sending the demented woman, Lena Fliege, back to St. Louis, was Monday refused. Counsel for the Board gave an opinion to the effect that the Board had no right and power to appropriate money for such purposes. The city must make the appropriation if there be any.

"Al" Drake's New Venture.

The "Man-about-town" of a New York paper has this to say of the Hon. A. A. Drake, of Westfield, whose wife is the sister of Mrs. Joseph Sandford of West Seventh street:

"'Al' Drake, who used to be one of the gayest of the stock shooters in Exchange Court, has recently settled down and gone into fancy tiling. He abandoned 'stock raising' on the Street and in the Jersey wolds some time last year; but he has not forgotten his old methods of rushing things on a customer. I met him at the Westminster Hotel not long ago, and began to catechise him about the Street. He shut me off instanter, and, pulling a piece of tiling from his coat pocket, opened fire on me like Colonel Mulberry Sellers anent the virtuous superiority of this specimen over all other lapidary decorations known to architects, and finally wound up by assuring me in his most robust and voluble manner that, so far as he was concerned, philanthropy, not avarice, had driven him into this new branch of trade. 'Al' is a sort of clairvoyant, he claims; I hope he sees his way clear to success in tiling."

The Rev. Mr. Koerchli's Appeal.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS: Will you kindly allow me a few remarks about the unfortunate Mrs. Fliege. A few weeks ago my attention to her was attracted by an appeal made by the Chief of Police, but having been unwell I was unable to see her until lately. The other day I saw her and had a long conversation with her. I do not intend to tire the reader with an unnecessarily lengthy report of my visit, but allow me to state the following:

Her mental disorder, which has been nothing else than the natural consequence of the heartless treatment she suffered, and of the helpless condition she was in, is entirely gone, but she is still feeble.

I think her's to be one of the most pitiable cases, taking all in all, which ever came to my knowledge, and she not only needs, but is worthy of, all the help we can give her.

Therefore, I support the appeal made by Mr. Carey a few weeks ago, with all my heart, and hope God may open a good many hearts more in her behalf. Especially I would appeal very urgently and cordially to all Germans whom God has blessed with earthly means—and there are many of them. Remember the word: "Wohlzuthun und mitzutheilen vergesset nicht, denn solche Opfer gefallen Gott wohl."

I will be thankful for every cent given to me for this poor lady, and will place it in proper hands. I am still unwell and therefore cannot go around myself, otherwise I would gladly do so.

F. KOERCHLI, Pastor.

President French Confesses and Re-signs.

There was a full attendance in Reform Hall Sunday night. Vice President Harper occupied the chair, Rev. Mr. Cleaver read the Scripture lesson and offered prayer, and the music, as usual, was led by Mr. Vanderbeek.

The speakers were Dr. Burnett and Rev. Mr. Cleaver, both of whom delivered able and very appropriate addresses, dwelling largely upon Charity and Mercy as foremost among the fundamental teachings of Christ and necessary to be obeyed by all His real followers. Mr. Cleaver also set forth the broad mission of the Reform Club of Plainfield, which was instituted to rescue the perishing, lift up the fallen, strengthen the weak, and to labor for and encourage all to stand upon the solid rock of total abstinence.

When signers to the pledge were called for, President French came forward from the audience and re-took the obligation. He subsequently ascended the platform and manfully and honestly avowed that he had been induced to violate his pledge, stated particularly the circumstances under which he went astray, and feelingly regretting the fact, renewed his connection with the Club and its cause, declaring that he would in the future dedicate increased efforts on behalf of its grand and good purposes. The remarks of Mr. French produced a marked effect, and at the close of the meeting many took him by the hand and spoke words of kindness and encouragement. Great interest was manifested, and the large audience received a most beautiful and touching benediction from the lips of Mr Cleaver.

Monday morning Mr. French sent to the Executive Committee of the Club, a peremptory resignation of his office as President.

Plainfield's "Oldest Inhabitants."

It may be interesting to our readers to know that at the present time there are forty-two citizens residing in this city who are over eighty years of age, and the aggregate age of them all is 3,512. Most of the above, many of whom were among the early settlers in Plainfield, are to-day hale and hearty and enjoying good health, which goes to show that the healthfulness of the city is above reproach, and comparatively free from sickness or disease of any nature.

Fruit Thieving.

Probably no produce raiser in this locality suffers more loss by fruit thieving than Mr. Halstead Compton of West Front street, and that gentleman is determined to put a stop to the practice even if it takes all Summer. This petty thieving has been carried on for several years past, and more particularly so within the past two years. The boys not only steal the apples and other fruit while it is green, but they club the trees and damage them to a great extent. Last year Mr. Compton realized only four baskets of apples from his entire orchard, and the preceding year he got scarcely enough apples for his own use. Mr. Compton's melon crop is now about ready to harvest, and for the benefit of the melon thieves it may be stated that Mr. C.'s shot gun is also in good working order.

Thomas Flynn, John Shannon and James Dunavan were defendants before Justice Nodyne, on Tuesday, charged with stealing apples from Mr. Compton's orchard. The former pleaded not guilty, but the two latter pleaded guilty to the charge. Nevertheless the young men were each obliged to furnish $100 bail to wait the action of the Grand Jury.

FELTVILLE DAM SAFE.

Things at Scotch Plains are recovering their old appearance and the great flood of 1889 has become a matter of history. There is a demand for good men to work on the roads and on private grounds so great as to exceed the supply, but this does not seem to lessen the number of incompetent men who work for low wages and who are dear at any price.

Mr. Olaf Jonsen, I believe, has the contract for laying the sidewalk on Front street. Although that is one of the busiest thoroughfares of the village, it has remained for a long time comparatively neglected. It is to be hoped that when repaired it will be as good a walk as that on Park avenue. Two deep gullies running right across the sidewalk, one at Mr. Clark's and one at Mr. Treadwell's, need immediate attention, and the loose stones along the old Thys' estate render that part of the walk very troublesome, not to say dangerous. And while the road master is about it, wouldn't it be a good plan to trim off the lower branches of the trees, as was done in Mr. Kyte's district?

Mr. Ackerman has had men constantly at work on the big Feltville dam, on Sundays as well as week days, and he says that the dam is now perfectly safe.

But haven't we been borrowing a good deal of trouble about that now famous dam after all? Old residents say that the danger was greatly exaggerated, and that no such awful consequences would have ensued if the Feltville dam had burst. Mr. VanVolkenburgh says that the average depth of the pond is not over four feet. E. M. Johnston, who probably knows as much about the topographical formation of this section as any man in Union county, says that the amount of water back of the dam is very small. "I worked on that dam forty years ago," said he, "and the deep water does not run back for more than two hundred feet. There are two tongues of land projecting from the hills which border the pond, and these two meet in the shape of V a little way above the dam. This forms a basin which is very deep, but it is all the deep water there is in the pond. Two hundred feet above the dam the water is not over one's head. At the head of the pond the water divides, and what remains in the Feltville lake simply covers the ground for about a mile."

From this it would seem that we were a long way off from Johnstown last week, and even from the danger of rivalling that ill fated town.

Feltville has been mentioned in the Metropolitan papers a great many times during the last two weeks, but the free advertising it has received is not of a kind that will attract great multitudes to it as a Summer resort. And yet as a matter of fact, the cottages there were well up on the bluff, and were perhaps in the safest place of any in that district, but strangers reading in the papers about Feltville and its great flood of water can hardly be expected to understand this.

It is to be noticed that in all the accounts of the flood which have appeared in the newspaper, reference is continually made to the "Feltville dam," but nowhere do we find any mention of "Glenside." This only goes to show what a difficult matter it is to arbitrarily change the name of a place, so as to have it known by an appellation different from that which has been used for years and years.

The gutter on Park avenue between the Women's Exchange and Guttridge's butcher shop is in a very bad condition. It should be filled up so as to afford a good driveway for the wagons that are constantly passing to and from the interior of the block.

Mr. Seeley says now that he will not build the mill again, and so the employes are looking for other work.

Mr. McNair thinks that the loss to the mill will not exceed twenty-five thousand dollars, or perhaps thirty.

The sensational accounts of the flood which filled the columns of the Metropolitan press, and the still worse exaggerations which appeared in the Philadelphia papers have been the cause of the sending of numerous kind offers of assistance by the friends of the Scotch Plainsites. Any number of letters had been received, proffering clothing and shelter for the inhabitants of this bereaved town. The "ragged and dishevelled likeness of its former self" which a sensational paper represented as being the condition of Plainfield, has evidently been received as the true situation of Scotch Plains.

THE PRESS has already spoken of the great crowd which thronged to Seeley's mill last Sunday. A party of three young gentlemen, to wit, Messrs William Hazell, Frank Roulstone and Ernest Hand, proceeded from there to the Feltville back pond, and in coming back lost themselves. Taking by mistake a wood-cutter's road, which ended in a peach orchard, they at last made their way to the East gate of Feltville, back of Mountain avenue. Starting thence for the tower they became confused by the numerous paths and crossed the mountain and came out at the other Feltville gate before they knew where they were. During the latter part of their journey they had no guide but the setting sun, and if it had not been for that they might have wandered about all night, or they might possibly have started to walk around in a never ending circle and be walking around there yet.

The remarkable parade of the Italians, headed by Sig. Macaroni, has also been mentioned in THE PRESS. Sig. Spaghetti and Sig. Cheepalaba formed the band. Sig. Banannapeela, who acted as Colonel, told me that they were only marching "for fun," to imitate "un a'chiale in Italia."

Mr. Baker is better than he was, but he is still a pretty sick man. Mr. Baker has worked very hard for a great many years and when he was attacked by nervous prostration he had to give up.

Mr. Robert T. Johnston, the librarian of the Public Library, and Mr. William Noble, Secretary, are spending their vacation at Ocean Grove.

Miss Sadie Binns, formerly of Scotch Plains, has been visiting with her friend and former next door neighbor, Miss Frantz.

While at the Library the other night, I heard divers strange noises in the direction of the goat closet belonging to the Royal Arcanum. The goat evidently scaled all of the awful and blood-curdling ceremonies which attended the initiation of Mr. William Strong. But that is a long story, and must be reserved for next week.

SUBURBAN GATHERINGS.

—Vacation days for the school children are numbered.

SOMERVILLE PUTS THE SECOND GAME.

Oh, somewhere in this favored land the sun is shining bright,
The band is playing somewhere, and somewhere hearts are light.
And somewhere men are laughing, and somewhere children shout;
But there is no joy in Plainfield—John Harkins struck us out.

The second of the games between the Crescent nine of Plainfield and the West End Club of Somerville, is at last, after many postponements, a thing of the past, and crape is crept on the door of the Bowling Club.

On Saturday afternoon last the Somerville management placed in the field a team of stalwart players picked from the best of New York's semi-professionals; yet in spite of their weight, experience and previous expectation, the big ones were not able to score until the eighth inning, and then only by luck.

The Crescent nine was composed of the regular players, but of the West Ends only Harkins, Davenport and Bergen were among the players that composed Saturday's team from Somerville. The game was an exciting one because of its closeness besides the intense local feeling that is an environment of the Plainfield-Somerville contests for the past two years. Almost two thousand people witnessed it—a quarter of which number were of the gentler sex—and all yelled themselves hoarse with approbation and heeded not the broiling sun which seemed desirous to make up for past days of obscurity.

Considering the array of sluggers that stepped to the plate before him, Gately pitched a reasonably good game. With the help of his support, who pulled eleven flies down in safety, he held the Somerville employees to six hits. But Davenport was the only one who smiling Patrick was able to strike out—and it was all Davenport's own carelessness, too—while even the courteous Bergen, who Somerville does not seem to appreciate, savagely lifted the ball through the atmosphere in four long drives that would each have been good for two bases at least if McLaughlin and Hayden had not gobbled them as if big hits were just pie to them.

Bowes, as usual, caught a great game, and shut them all out by his superb throwing to second. Only one base was stolen by the West Ends and that on one of Lee's four errors. Billy's lame arm would not permit him to play his old place on third, and a consequence seems to be that he has made more errors in the last two games than during the entire season.

Captain Dave Condon played short in good shape, with a record of three assists, three put-outs and not an error. Cadmus, too, on third, accepted every chance given him, besides making a two-bagger and the first run for Plainfield in the eighth inning, although he had been put at the bottom of the batting list. Farrer who was "filling" Demarest's vacant place, caught one fly, was three times at the bat and went out each time for assaulting the wide outside.

McMurray played an errorless first, but the credit which he was receiving from the assembled multitude was entirely blotted out in the eighth inning when he spoiled the Crescents' prospect of at least three runs.

But if ever one man won a game for his team, it was Mr. John Harkins on Saturday afternoon last. With a mouth full of gum but wearing that same old aggravating sneer, he shot the regulation leather sphere across the plate in the same old way that made him a terror to Plainfield last year. As shown by the score below, he mowed down eleven men on strikes, including every one but Bowes, Hayden and Gately. Every ball he threw seemed to sing a song of but two words, "Ah, There!" and it was lost in Sublich's mitten.

A muff by Moorhead of a rather badly thrown ball, was the West Ends' only error. Block was the only fielder who had a chance, and he captured four high flies, thus spoiling the base hit records of McMurray, Bowes, Condon and Gately. Only Bishop, Harkins, Davenport and Block succeeded in making safe hits—Bergen's three bagger in the ninth just tipping McLaughlin's fingers as it went over his head and thus giving him an error instead of a credit to the batter.

There were only two earned runs in the game, and they were both made by the Crescents. In the eighth, after two balls and a strike on him, Cadmus hit a little safe one that just rolled in the crowd so that he could reach second easily but he kept on to third. The ball was fielded to Williams—whose name was Nichols when he was blacklisted by the professional Louisvilles—and he touched the grand stand's favorite out three feet from the base. The umpire did not see it, declared the runner safe and he came in on Lee's single. The other earned run was by Bowes in the ninth, when he made a safe hit and stole every base including the home plate. McMurray in the eighth stepped off of first base in a fit of carelessness, and was easily touched out.

The West End's runs were made by a streak of bad luck for the Crescents in the eighth inning, that took the heart from out of Gately and the smile from off his lips, in the ninth. In the eighth Block went to first on a hit; Bergen went out by a beautiful catch of Hayden's; Bishop reached first, and Block took second on the former's hit; and Moorhead was given his on balls, thus filling the bases with but one man out. Williams then knocked a short hit to Condon who quickly returned it to the plate, but Bowes dropped the ball and Block, who was being forced home, kicked it far enough out of the way to let two more in. Harkins and Sublich were speedily retired, but the game was lost. In the next inning Gately was freely batted. He seemed to have given up all effort to win. For seven innings but one hit had been made, yet in the eighth and ninth, four safe ones were lined out by the New Yorkers and one by Davenport. In the ninth three more runs were added by the West Ends, and the score closed as follows. Mr. Wm. Cadmus' umpiring was most satisfactory, and even the Somerville attendants did not complain. But then they won, you know; and that makes a great difference:

Willis, went to New Brooklyn, Monday afternoon to confer with the township committee of Piscataway and Mr. Baker, the owner of the mill at the point where the washout occurred during the last flood, with a view of ascertaining who must make the repairs to the road, it being very necessary that work should be commenced immediately.

NEW GOODS.
NEW STYLES.

The styles we are now showing in Spring and Summer Suits for Men are models of the tailor's art. All-wool Cheviots, light or dark colors, at $9, are a sample of what we are doing, beyond the reach of any would-be competitors.

Twelve or fifteen new lines of Boys' Suits embellish that department, and vary in price from $4 to $10.

The whole North end of our great establishment is devoted to juvenile wear. Children's Suits will be found here. A dozen fresh styles have just come in, and the New All-wool Summer Fabrics are sold as low as $2 per suit.

—Oh, for a Y. M. C. A. building.

—There were many sight-seers at the "Notch" and at Feltville, Sunday.

—The drug store clerk complains that he gets too much [illegible] exercise.

—Three thousand enumerators will be engaged in taking the census next year.

—The Street Commissioner has been plowing up the gutters about the City Park.

—The city park was well patronized during Sunday afternoon and that evening.

—The coming Saturday will be another of the salt water days at Boynton Beach and Florida Grove.

—Vacation for the school children is almost gone. Boys and girls make the best of the remaining days.

—One of the best ball games of the season will be that on Saturday, between the Crescents of this city, and the Buttermilks of New York city.

—A number of boys formed a group on the sidewalk under a street lamp, at the corner of Fourth and Liberty streets late last evening, and amused themselves by playing poker with a five-cent limit.

—Detective Large of the Central Railroad force, was in the city on Saturday, making inquiry with reference to the accident to John Wittemann, the boy who was injured by the cars near Westfield, on Friday.

—The deciding game between the Young Crescents of this city, and the Young Americans of Dunellen, was played at the latter place this morning, and resulted in a defeat for the Young Crescents by a score of 17 to [illegible].

—On account of a heavy track, there were no regular trotting contests on the track of the Gentlemen's Driving Park Association, on Saturday afternoon. There were, however, several exhibition mile heats trotted by local horses.

—Mr. H. Willett now takes second place with a score of 231, in the three months' bowling contest for the $100 worth of prizes offered at Olympia Alley. Mr. C. Kreweson is still first with 233, while C. VanWinkle drops to third place with 227.

—Out of a total of thirty-one notices sent out to property owners in North Plainfield, requesting them to trim their trees in conformity to the borough ordinance, twenty have complied with the notice, and the result is that the street lighting is much better than heretofore.

—A Committee of the Hunterdon county Board of Freeholders met Tuesday, to estimate the damage done to bridges, etc., by the recent floods, and to make arrangements for replacing and repairing the structures injured or destroyed. The loss will reach close to $20,000.

—There will be more State and county fairs this season than in any previous year, says a contemporary. Fairs promote the breeding of better stock, the farmers are brought in contact with one another, newer and more systematic methods of cultivation are taught and improved implements are inspected.

—It is stated by a publication called Tobacco that for the year ending June 30, 1889, the enormous number of 2,151,515,-300 cigarettes were made in this country. And, if we may judge from the sickening pollution of the air in some quarters hereabouts, we should say that a full half of the nasty little things were smoked in Plainfield.

—Some one has taken the trouble to find out how far a farmer has to walk to put in and cultivate forty acres of corn. To plow the ground with a sixteen-inch three-horse plow, he travels 300 miles; to harrow the ground thoroughly before planting, he walks 50 miles; to cultivate it afterwards he will have to travel 300 miles, besides gathering it.

The Preparatory School for Boys.

The people of this city know nothing that is not in the highest praise of Mr. Leal's school, and we commend it to all who want the best sort of preparatory school for their boys under the pleasantest auspices.

These columns have recorded from year to year the long list of graduated students that have been admitted direct from Mr. Leal's school into Yale, Harvard and other colleges they have personally preferred.

Shooting Tournament.

The fifth annual tournament of the Middlesex Gun Club will take place early in October. The shooting will be at the club's grounds at Dunellen on October 8, 9, 10 and 11, and the first two days will be devoted to live bird shooting. $1,300 in cash is guaranteed. The committee consists of Messrs. W. Fred Quimby, T. H. Keller, M. W. [illegible], N. Apgar and Wm. Sigler. Particulars and programmes can be had upon application to Mr. W. F. Quimby, 201 Broadway or Mr. W. L. Force, the Secretary, Plainfield.

Another [illegible] the Bridges.

A correspondent of THE PRESS, Tuesday, asked how it was that the city granted the Central Railroad Company permission to construct a sewer from their North avenue station, yet now, under the ruling of the corporation counsel, the city has "no right" to grant a franchise for the construction of a sewage system for the service of the whole community?

The only reason THE PRESS can give for it all, is that the city has a different counsel, now.

The Flood Losses in Union County.

The cost of the late floods and freshets to Union county, as ascertained by the Freeholders on Monday, will be not far from $30,000. The damage to the Plainfield bridges is $[illegible]; Westfield, $5,375; Summit, $4,300; Springfield, $2,000; Fanwood, $2,400, and Union, $1,300, and the damage to the Elizabeth and Rahway bridges is yet to be figured up. Both bridges at Summit, one costing $2,300 and the other $1,300, will have to be replaced.

A resolution was adopted authorizing destroyed bridges to be replaced by iron structures, and all the repairs to be made in a substantial and durable manner.

The money for these bridges and repairs cannot come from the levy of this year, and under the law of 1882 the Director and County Collector were authorized to borrow such amount as will be necessary.

A Trial by Jury.

An amusing case was tried before Justice Wadsworth and a six-men jury, Thursday afternoon, which resulted in the jury awarding the plaintiff $25. Mr. Abram Q. Fine of West Front street, brought suit against his neighbor, Ferdinand Smith, to recover $50 damages alleged to be due him on account of the defendant's chickens scratching in his (the complainant's) yard. Corporation Counsel Marsh appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. W. A. Coddington for the defence. The latter, however, was taken suddenly ill when the case was called, but he held out pluckily, and ably defended his client.

The jury rendered a verdict of $25 for the plaintiff.

MAYOR MALE'S BRAVERY.

And now we learn that even His Honor, Mayor Male, could not restrain his indignation, but personally and vigorously told the editor of the news to his face, that his paper had done more to damage the prosperity of Plainfield than all the floods it has ever experienced.

And we have the word of Julian Scott—one of those who held that Night Watch at the awful Feltville dam—that he has requested the editor of the news to keep his name out of the sheet.

For their safety we will not publish a list of those who have stopped taking the news because of its falsehoods and foolishness. A list of the advertisers who would withdraw from its columns if they dared, we also refrain from publishing just now.

Beat 'Em Shooting Too!

For a month or so past a shooting gallery firm in Somerville have had three prizes on exhibition, which were to be presented to the three persons making the best record at rifle practice. Since then the "hayseeds" from the neighborhood of the pottery field, have nightly blazed away at the bull's eye in the gallery, and occasionally a stray bullet would hit the target—that's all. Thursday night was the time set for awarding the prizes, so five of our local sportsmen went up to Somerville and brought home every prize.

In the classification shoot, that night there were about twenty-five entries, including the five from here. The first prize, a handsome banjo, was won by Harry Meeker, who scored 48 out of a possible 50; William Patterson scored 47 and won the second prize, a rifle, and Max Hanson scored 46 and eloped with the third prize, a pair of boxing gloves.

In what next would our neighbors like to engage?

IN PROHIBITION PLAINFIELD.

A member of the Reform Club with a medical friend, went into a Plainfield pharmacy, the other day, and presented the following prescription:

℞
Tr Gentian C. [illegible] 1
Spiritus Frumenti [illegible] 6
Aq. Carbonat [illegible] 6
M et Div in Haustus No. 2
8-5-89

The young clerk put up the prescription and administered it as directed. In plain English it called for an infinitesimal portion of tincture of gentian, a glass full of rye whiskey and some plain soda. "Mix and divide in draughts for two," were the instructions at the foot, and the Reform Club member and his medical friend each drank a dose.

Just as they finished the proprietor of the pharmacy entered, and upon seeing the prescription he indignantly remarked that if he had been in the pair would not have got what they came for. One of them then offered the pay for the prescription, but this the proprietor refused with the assertion that he did not keep a saloon nor sell rum in defiance of the law.

RUN OVER HIS OWN SON.

Mr. Wm. Geddis of Dunellen, a well-known dealer and carter of hay to Newark, has of late had very bad luck, having first lost one of his team of iron grays valued at $700, and then he ran over his seven-year-old boy, last Thursday, with a load of hay weighing 4,500 lbs.

Mr. Geddis had just bought a horse to match the one left, and was driving in the lane from the road with a large load of hay, when his little boy came out and asked, "Papa, how do you like your new team?" The reply was, "First rate! Best team I ever had! Look out; don't get near the wagon." As he drove in the gateway, however, the little fellow was hit by the hay and thrown to the ground. The hind wheel passed over him just below the ribs. The little fellow got up and walked about 10 or 12 yards, but then dropped exhausted.

The father had at once climbed down from the load as he felt the jar of the wagon, fearing the very accident that had happened. The unfortunate lad was at once carried home, and Dr. Brakely summoned. Upon examination no bones were discovered broken. The mark of the wheel was plainly to be seen where it passed over him.

The child is now doing well, and if inflammation or mortification does not set in, in due time the doctor expects he will be around as usual.

Since writing the above the PRESS reporter has seen the little fellow and he appears bright, looks well, talks freely and has a good appetite. Great hopes are entertained for his speedy recovery.

Store a Victory.

Thursday night burglars entered the store of W. M. Hunter, who sells general merchandise at Glen Gardner, and stole some silver spoons and pen knives, two revolvers, a coat and some bicycle shirts.

Plainfield's Population Increased.

Within the past two weeks the population in this city has been increased to the extent of three, namely, a son born to Mr. Louis Kline of East Second street, a daughter born to Mr. Robinson Pound of the same street, and morning of Aug. 7 a son was born to Mr. Richard Seamon of East Third street.

It Can't Change Its Record.

This is what the news of Aug. 3, says it said:

> The news the day after the occurrence placed the loss at $80,000 in Plainfield.

> Torn through its heart by a great flood of water, Plainfield today is but a ragged and disheveled likeness of its former self.

Would Not Tell a Lie.

A truthful (?) exchange says: "A farmer, while cutting oats near this place, made a misslick, and the sharp blade took off his right ear. He coolly picked up the detached member, wrapped it in his handkerchief and carried it home. His wife sewed it back into position, and it was knitted nicely and is doing business at the old stand."

A Sad Announcement.

It is with sorrow that we record today the death of Mary A., the beloved wife of Thomas G. Cole, which occurred at her home on Terrill road, August 7, in her 29th year. The announcement is particularly distressing from the fact that the deceased gave birth to an eighteen-pound child previous, which was the direct cause of her death.

A Curious People.

Three families of English gypsies are in camp on Park avenue near the Driving Park. They have come all the way from Ohio since Spring living in their handsomely furnished wagons. They are intelligent and courteous people, and a visit to them with a peep into their strange ways and means of living, is quite a rare treat.

Sued Her Employer.

The case of Winnifred Ferguson vs. Mr. David Pond, to recover $16 wages alleged to be due to the complainant, came up before Justice Nash August 7, afternoon. Mr. W. R. Codington appeared for the plaintiff and Assemblyman Ulrich represented the defence. It is claimed that the woman, who was employed as a domestic by Mr. Pond, was discharged for cause before her month was up, and she brought suit to recover a full month's pay.

Neither the defendant nor his witnesses were in court that day, and the justice rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Counsel for the defence thereupon filed an appeal bond, to contest the case in the District Court at Elizabeth.

ENCLOSED GROUNDS.

At meeting, August 7, of the Plainfield Bowling Club, the committee in charge of the Crescent ball nine was authorized to have the grounds at LaGrande Avenue and Richmond street entirely enclosed provided another year's lease could be obtained at a fair rental.

Other business of the meeting was the election of Messrs F. O. Herring, G. W. Endicott, E. E. Anthony, Frank P. Huff, Thomas Kellar and C. D. Boice, as active members; and the enrolment on the list of honorary members, of the resident members of the ball team as long as they shall be active players, viz: D. Condon, W. Lee, A. W. Demarest, Jas. McMurray, George Cadmus and McLaughlin.

The Great Dr. Vincent.

The Chautauquan says: "Bishop John H. Vincent, formerly of Plainfield, tells a good story which is partly at his expense, but chiefly at the expense of an enthusiastic father. In travelling one day he was accosted very warmly by a strange gentleman, who said: 'This is Dr. Vincent, I believe. I am glad to meet you for my own sake, but most of all on account of my little boy in the next car, who will regard meeting you as an epoch in his life.' The boy was brought in and informed with great impressiveness that 'this is Dr. Vincent.' 'I don't know him,' said the urchin. 'What!' exclaimed the embarrassed father, 'you often heard of him.' 'No, I aint,' maintained the boy. 'Why, just think a moment; you've heard his name connected with something. What is it?' The boy, realizing that something was expected of him, asked, hesitatingly, 'Is it Dr. Vincent's Tooth Powder?'"

An Abstainer's Argument.

The well-known total abstinence advocate, Thomas A. Murphy, was in Chicago recently, and when asked by a reporter what he thought of the prohibition movement which he has always opposed, Mr. Murphy said: "The prohibition cake is dough. I know it would prove so and hope they are beginning to find out you can't legislate a man sober. Prohibition means free whisky and that's all you can make of it. The idea of a prohibition law proving effectual in Chicago, for instance, is ridiculous. In a sparsely settled country or in small towns perhaps it could be made so, but never in the centres of population.

"I believe that a prohibition law would simply tie our hands as to restrictive measures, and then with prohibition that did not prohibit, where would we be?"

"What do you think of the submission of prohibition amendments in South Dakota?"

"Are they going to do it? Well, they will carry them. They can do it out there where the people are scattered, and possibly when they are passed the laws may actually prohibit, but I maintain that it is against all reason. Only think of it, telling a man he shall not produce an alcoholic beverage, when the natural tendency of every fruit of the garden and orchard is toward fermentation. You can never prohibit, but men can quit getting drunk if they will."

DENOUNCED ON ALL SIDES.

(From the Central Times.)

As a specimen of the ridiculous talk about the flood is the following sentence which began the account of the flood by the Plainfield news: "Torn through its heart by a great flood of water, Plainfield today is but a ragged and disheveled likeness of its former self." It can be truthfully said that a stranger to the topography of the city who had come to Plainfield the morning after the flood might have spent a long time in searching for the effects of the flood before he came upon any "ragged and disheveled likeness" of anything whatever, even among the few low places that were flooded.

* * *

The New York papers have fairly reveled and rioted in our misfortune, and, in the ecstacy of their wild mendacity, have magnified and distorted the facts over which their reporters gloated. The New York Tribune, in particular, which lays special claim to be a truthful journal and free from sensationalism, has within the last few days outdone the extra sensational journals in its plunging and preposterous romances about the Plainfield flood. To say the truth, one of our local daily papers has been hardly less sensational and absurd. We hear it denounced roundly on all sides as having done more harm to Plainfield by its falsehoods and foolishness than all the floods that ever visited us.

Unnecessary Whistling to be Checked.

The recent complaints of THE PRESS and other newspapers of towns along the line of the Central railroad, have been the means of calling forth from General Superintendent Olhausen the following circular, addressed to the locomotive engineers under his charge:

THE PRESS said that the Central's Superintendent was an accommodating man who would abate the nuisance if his attention was called to it:

> There is much complaint by residents of cities and towns through which this road passes of the loud, prolonged, frequent, and in many cases useless whistling indulged in by our locomotive engineers, and your attention is called to the matter with a view to removing the cause of complaint.
>
> Whistles must be used in accordance with Rules 41 to 58 [illegible], and the requirements of Rules 391 and 395 concerning the use of whistles must be strictly carried out. In using their whistles engineers must exercise proper judgment as to how loudly, how long and how frequently they should be blown. If the use for which the whistle is intended is close at hand the valve must not be opened as if calling or answering some one miles away. In calling for a switch, or calling in the signal man the whistle must not be sounded louder or longer than is positively necessary. There is no occasion for these frequent complaints if engineers follow the rules and exercise proper judgment in carrying them out, and prompt discipline will be enforced if this is not done.

How a Plainfield Visitor Lost and Found Her Pug.

Friday night's PRESS told of the fact that the Misses Moffett, of Philadelphia, were visiting ex-Postmaster Wallace Vail, and wife, in this city. The Bound Brook Chronicle of that day, tells the following incident of their journey:

"Last Saturday a lady arrived from Philadelphia at the Central depot in Bound Brook, having with her a pug dog and a bandbox. Her destination was Plainfield, but as the local train was not yet due she tied the dog to the bandbox and, leaving them on the platform, went into the waiting room. The canine caught on to the chance for some exercise and started up the track, dragging the box and closely pursued by Hackman David Taylor, who succeeded in grabbing the box, but just then the dog slipped his collar and made off at a speed that defied competition or capture.

"The lady was rendered disconsolate and nearly distracted by the sudden and unexplained departure of her traveling companion, but offered a liberal reward for his detention if found, and took her train for home, singing, 'O where can my little dog be?' Monday and Tuesday she returned in a carriage and was told that an energetic search had been prosecuted and the animal seen on several occasions, but not close enough for capture. She persevered, however, and was rewarded Tuesday morning by finding her pet, running about the gravel pit. She took Toby to her arms and peace and happiness were restored to the family of ex-Postmaster Wallace Vail of Plainfield."

"All the Year Round."

At this time of the year you can buy to great advantage any kind of coat and vest for dress wear, as the goods used are of the weight called "All the year round," and such patterns as flat diagonals, wide and narrow wales, dice figures and birds-eye effects in solid colors, or with bright silk threads woven through goods never go out of fashion. Watson & Co. keep their custom tailors busy during the dull season making these elegant garments and have now all sizes on their lines, many of which are sample garments on which you can see the touches of the new Fall shapes. The prices are $8 and $2.50 or $10 and $3, finished with all custom extras and hung in their custom department, where work is now suspended until they get their new cutting rooms in their extension through to Nos. 166 and 168 Market street in shape for their large force of cutters. Watson & Co. want plenty of room for their cutting force, as they have all their garments cut by shears just the same as custom work, and will not use any of the cutting machines by which ready-made garments are generally cut. They want more economical and careful work and better fitting garments than any machine will cut. See these handsome coats and vests; they are swell garments that cannot be duplicated, and you can get them now fresh from the hands of the tailors daily, free from all creases, wrinkles or any objectionable ready-made appearance at prices that will make you remember Watson & Co. as long as you wear them, but you want to be lively about it if you expect to get the finest goods and handsomest patterns as Saturday will make gaps on the line.—Newark Press.

Why Should I Go to Montana?

Great Reservation. Because 18,000,000 acres of free Government land, with a delightful climate, and equally suited for general farming and stock raising, have just been opened to the homeseeker, in the Milk River Valley and near Benton and Great Falls.

Stock Raising. Because the favorable climate and superior grasses of Montana make it the natural home of horses, cattle, sheep and other domestic animals; and because Winter feeding is not required, as stock grazes at large the year around.

General Farming. Because a rich soil and abundant Summer rains produce wheat, oats, rye, barley and the grasses and vegetables of a quality, size and yield unsurpassed.

Mining. Because Montana produces more of the precious metals than any other state or territory, and abundant opportunities remain to secure valuable properties at nominal cost.

Immigration. Because the Great Reservation is the meeting point of settlers from the Pacific Coast and from the Eastern States, and is the only extensive tract of good land left, suitable for settlement.

Business. Because the rapidly growing towns along the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Ry. offer splendid opportunities to engage in business.

Manufacturer. Because the 1,000,000 horse-power water-power at Great Falls, the extensive coal veins, the wool, mineral and grain raising resources of Montana offer exceptional opportunities to the manufacturer.

Tourist. Because the canon of the Gates of the Mountains, the Great Falls of the Missouri, the Giant Fountain and Continental Divide offer the most sublime and diversified scenery to be found on the Continent. Take a Summer tour.

Why Travel by the St. P., M. & M. ? Because only by it can you travel through the largest body of free land left for settlement. Because it reaches the Great Falls, with the largest water-power on the Continent. Because it reaches Helena, the richest city of its size in the world; and because it is the cheapest and best route to Butte, the largest mining camp on earth. Special tourists' and landseekers' rates. Daily trains through solid to Montana. Choice of three routes to the Pacific Coast. THREE KINDS!

I know
The past, and thence I will essay to glean
A warning for the future, so that man
May profit by his errors, and derive
Experience from his folly.—SHELLEY.

Then comes the thoughtless man, who wends his way to the fashionable tailor, gets a good suit, but pays a very big price for the same.

The wise man deals with some reputable manufacturer of Clothing and secures garments fully equal to those made to order at about half custom prices Thus the wise man gets his Clothing, with quality and workmanship thrown in, as cheap as the foolish man his miserable trash. An unusually large number of wise men are being attracted to our store this Spring. Whether it's a case of "once bitten twice shy" or not, we don't know, but certainly their patronage of does credit to their good judgment, and we don't think, once having traded here they'll be caught by clap-trap again. We know what we sell. We make it, and neither time, effort or money is spared to produce garments that will do us credit and still further establish our reputation. It's a selfish interest we take, we'll admit, but the effect is the same. It's there, and it pays both you and us.

A NIGHT IN WHITECHAPEL.

A New York Journalist Visits the Wickedest Spot in the World.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

English romancists have had no more fruitful topic than crime and criminals, and for many years the Seven Dials and Petticoat Lane have been the localities where the villains of fiction were supposed to have their habitation. No novel was complete without reference to the [illegible] of the localities named. The Seven Dials was indeed a thief's paradise, and Petticoat Lane a place where [illegible] thieves, prize fighters, scarlet women, and robbers held high carnival. But time has changed all this. The two sections of London above referred to, are bad enough in all conscience, but Whitechapel has completely eclipsed them, and to-day the East End of London has no rival in the world as the hot bed of sin, misery and squalor. Denver, the Black Hills country, and the mining camps of the far West and Australia, never in the palmiest days of their sin could hold a candle to Whitechapel. It is a new Sodom and Gomorrah, and stands alone among the big cities as the wickedest spot in the world. New York and Chicago are wicked enough, but they are as sucking babes to Whitechapel. Paris is a city of gilt-edged sin [illegible] below the surface, and is done with an art that may somewhat palliate its [illegible]. Berlin, Vienna, Brussels and Liverpool may well hang their heads in shame, but none of them can in the slightest degree approach Whitechapel.

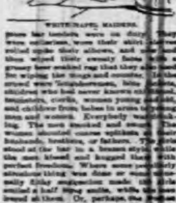
The recent unequaled performances of the skillful carver who hid his talent under the sobriquet of Jack the Ripper, has brought Whitechapel squarely to the front, and the dashing American tourist [illegible] taking in London town, first inquires the route to Whitechapel. There are many ways of seeing it. If you go to it in daylight, and simply drive along the Mile-road there is little to be seen that cannot be duplicated in the city [illegible] or in Liverpool, Berlin, Vienna, San Francisco, New Orleans, Chicago or New York. If you go on top of one of the [illegible] busses, as many persons do, you come away with a confused idea of dirty [illegible], drunken women, a blaze of yellow [illegible], and the sickening odor of decayed [illegible] vegetables. If you would see it at its worst, go on a Saturday night and [illegible] until Sunday morning. Walk [illegible] point beyond the Bank of England [illegible] the crooked streets and alleys, with only here and there a light, and you will see Whitechapel at its worst and at a time when you will remember it to your dying day.

It was my good fortune to fall in with a Scotland Yard detective, who, for a consideration, agreed to accompany me. He was a typical English detective, a [illegible] more than a worker, [illegible] but a man known to most of the [illegible] gang who make up the London [illegible], and who had won the blue ribbon of his bureau for personal bravery [illegible].

"Put on the oldest and shabbiest clothing you have," he advised me, "and leave at home your jewelry, your valuables and all your money, but enough to [illegible] through and meet me at the Three Nuns Tavern at 11 o'clock. Don't take any firearms. It might be well, however, to carry a good, keen-edged knife. A [illegible] crook is afraid of a knife. You will not have to use it, but, if we should get into a tight corner the sight of it will [illegible] the rascals."

It was a beautiful night, a trifle warm, but fairly comfortable. A big, [illegible] harvest moon hung in the sky like a ball of molten fire. Myriad stars looked down from a perfect sky. The streets were thronged with humanity. The doors of the Three Nuns Tavern swung back and forth, a thirsty crowd surging in, and a drunken mob elbowing its way out. A [illegible] or



WHITECHAPEL MAIDENS.

[illegible] bar tenders were on duty. They were collarless, wore their shirt sleeves rolled up to their elbows, and now and then wiped their sweaty faces with a greasy beer soaked rag that they also used for wiping the mugs and counter. In the crowd were longshoremen, [illegible], children who had never known [illegible], [illegible], clerks, women young and old, and children from babes in arms to [illegible] men and women. Everybody was drinking. The men smoked and swore. The women shouted coarse epithets at their husbands, brothers, or fathers. The girls stood at the bar in a brazen style, while the men kissed and hugged them with perfect freedom. Where some particularly atrocious thing was done or some [illegible] filthy suggestion made the girls smiled a half [illegible] smile, while the others leered at them. Or, perhaps, the [illegible] not quite so drunk as her neighbors [illegible] the [illegible], and [illegible] companion's face or dashed a mug of foaming beer over him. This was always the signal for a wild guffaw that could be heard across the street and attracted more visitors. A policeman pushed open the door, playfully smacked a girl under the chin, took her mug of beer from her, drank it himself and continued his round.

A breath of fresh air was welcome indeed. We passed along a few doors to another place where a big sign in gilt letters, "Gin Palace," said that the proprietor was at any rate candid. A glance through the door revealed scenes [illegible] what like those which we had witnessed in the "Three Nuns." Along a block or two we moved and a neighboring [illegible] claimed it. The electric light and the ill-smelling petroleum lamps made the street as light as day. Here is an old [illegible] store, and next to it a gin place, [illegible] cheap restaurant, where "winkles" [illegible] are frying in the window, and [illegible] like hot cakes at a penny each. They are still hot, and are wrapped in dirty [illegible] papers for purchasers, who sneak off [illegible] some dark alley to devour them. The odor was paralyzing. Now and then we come upon big [illegible] looking [illegible] sometimes a group of [illegible] factory girls, in smart red Jerseys, [illegible] for a frolic. But these were rare. [illegible] appearances are deceptive the [illegible] tribute is still paid in Whitechapel [illegible] the stamp of sin and degradation [illegible] to be seen half the women [illegible]. Hucksters thronged the streets and shouted their wares in [illegible]. There are Punch and Judy shows [illegible] to try your skill in shooting, [illegible] inflating your lungs and all [illegible] places for the sale of penny [illegible]. The men smoke their pipes, [illegible] move along, now and then [illegible] shouting. The women join with [illegible] and high above the song is often [illegible] paralyzing oath. So it goes on block after block. As we come full upon a [illegible] young ruffians on a street corner, [illegible] my companion, the detective [illegible] in a twinkling, like magic [illegible] scattered and hidden themselves. They knew the detective's face.

"I had one of those up on suspicion of being 'Jack the Ripper,'" the detective [illegible] remarks, "but I [illegible] thought it would be safer to run."

We turn into a dark alley and [illegible] along slowly. Heads bobbed up [illegible] doors and tousled [illegible] where we passed. A quick footstep [illegible] behind and a [illegible], dirty hand brought [illegible] unceremoniously.

"Diamonds or silk?"

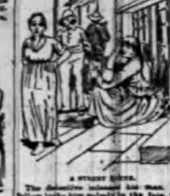
The detective turns on him and [illegible] "Anything cheap?"

The dirty chap with the [illegible] passes across the alley rapidly [illegible] doorway, pulls a bull's-eye lantern from his pocket, lights it, holds it up to my face, eyes me steadily to see if I can be trusted, turns to my friend the detective and does the same and as the light falls full on his face utters an oath and turns to run. He has recognized the detective but the latter's strong hand holds him in a vise-like grip.

"Show us your diamonds!" he commands.

The thief pleads eloquently for his release and says he hasn't any.

"Don't lie to me" says the detective. "I'm not after you to-night. Show my friend your diamonds or down you go to the jail on the old charge. We don't want to buy. We want to see them."



A STREET SCENE.

The detective releases his man. The fellow looks him calmly in the face, then thrusts his dirty hand into the bosom of his greasy shirt, pulls out a little package covered with a dirty cloth, and turns his bull's-eye lantern full on [illegible] a dozen stones of the purest water.

"Seen 'em, every one," says the detective as we move on. "He can nip a diamond pin better than any man in London. He's [illegible] cheap, too."

The thief shuffles off as we are accosted by two women. A sickly candle from an opposite window throws its light upon them. The oldest is thirty perhaps, but drink has made her appear to be forty. The youngest says she is seventeen although she doesn't look a day over thirteen, a tall thin sickly girl, who has lived a fast life and is now on the verge of delirium tremens. They are scantily clad, sickly looking in appearance, and repulsive in their talk. The younger offers to escort us through the district for two shillings, but her companion underbids her a shilling. Finally they agree to remain with us till morning for a shilling apiece, and as we move on a step they offer themselves for a [illegible] and a pint of gin.

Is there any spot outside of Whitechapel where women sell themselves so cheaply?

In the course of another two hours walk we are accosted at least five hundred times, and in each case the sum finally asked was only sixpence or twelve cents of American money.

Hour after hour we walk through the streets. The glorious harvest moon is waning away. In the East the first gray signs of dawn are visible. From a hallway where half a dozen persons are stretched on the floor asleep comes the moaning of a woman. In her arms she holds the cold form of a three months' old babe. Its life went out with the tide, and her shrieks are pitiful to hear. How long the babe has been dead no one can tell, nor whether it died from natural causes, a fall or suffocation. We know not. And the mother can tell nothing. She, like all her companions, laid down in her drunken stupor to sleep, and when she awoke her lifeless child lay at her side.

It is seven o'clock as we emerge into the Mile Road and start toward the city proper. The streets are still crowded. St. Paul's bells are pealing out the glad tidings that another Sabbath has come, and as we pass by the Three Nuns, tired of heat and foot, we see the lights still burning, a score of men standing at the bar and the drunken mother with her baby boy [illegible] in an adjoining alley. The little fellow has lost his only garment, and is as naked as when born. As we step over him a childish smile illumines his face, and the dimple in his sickly cheek was marked.

Who can tell what stirred his boyish brain and made him smile this glorious Sunday morning?

DAVID W[illegible].

The Place She Wanted.

"Now," said the bridegroom to the bride when they returned from their honeymoon trip, "let us have a clear understanding before we settle down to married life. Are you the president or vice-president of this society?" "I want to be neither president nor vice-president," she answered. "I will be content with a subordinate position." "What is that?" "Treasurer."

How to Scatter a Crowd.

A new way to scatter a crowd has been discovered. A man who found himself hemmed in by a dense throng near the corner of State and Washington streets, Chicago, while a circus procession was passing, pulled a bottle of ammonia from his pocket and spilled the contents pretty freely about. He had the entire sidewalk to himself in less than a minute.

THAT DECEPTIVE CORSAGE.

Loose to the Eye But Tight Enough to Kill.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

The young women who affect the extravagances of the Directoire period, the classic costumes of the Empire, and the whimsical sleeves and flat skirts of the Restoration look delightfully comfortable. There are no more puffs and bustles, no more reeds and steels, no more bunches of dust gathering draperies, no more pinched and pointed waists rising like corseted nereids from billows of satin and chantilly foam. The bodice of the summer is charming. It is trig and trim about the back and shoulders, but in front it lies in soft, graceful folds, and full, tender unrestrained lines. Was ever a girl so pretty and was she ever so hygienically gowned?

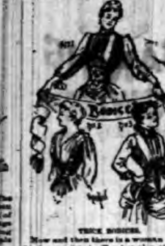
In good truth the bodice of the season is a trick bodice, a device to deceive the eyes of man. The pretty yokes with soft lace drawn up in gathers about the throat, the surplice folds which look so demurely careless whether or not they add an inch or two to one's size, the tucking the plaiting and the shirring, all of which appears so loose, so cool and so deliciously comfortable, the sashes which drape themselves from the shoulder or under the arm from the right or from the left with studied [illegible] apparently to the yards of material they contain, all these are but ornamental disguises, [illegible] trimmings which would lead one to suppose that the feminine half of creation had thrown away its corsets, whereas in reality it never drew the [illegible] lacings tighter. Think for a moment of the problem which is set before the fashionable woman, how to make herself small enough to put on what are technically known as "tailor" clothes, without [illegible] her waist measure.

All the fullness of the quaint round body of the new-old evening waist, or the [illegible] front of the vest or silk shirt of the outing gown is a mere accessory, having nothing to do with the foundation, the bony framework, to speak more in truth than in jest, of the summer bodice. This bony framework is the lining. It drapes the back as smooth as the cheek of a lily bud, it holds the bust with an iron grip in position, [illegible] may not exploit itself under its dainty garniture of India silk or [illegible]. [illegible] of the back under its [illegible], and as to the waist, the waist which is to be belted or sashed, [illegible]. From the standpoint of the [illegible]

The draped bodice is liable to abuse for it is a powerful engine and as dangerous as it is useful. In proper use [illegible] for good or evil every line of it can be made to tell. [illegible] who weighs too much for her height. [illegible] amount off her apparent avoirdupois, for either purpose the old-fashioned plain-whaled costume was a necessity. It left the woman just as she was, every defect definitely and uncompromisingly stated. The new trimmed bodice either exaggerates or [illegible] the feminine characteristics. To make the stout woman plump simply, the trimmed bodice, taken in itself a quantity of soft dark surah or else some stripe of delicate needlework embroidery, silk or braid [illegible] in a [illegible] of medium width at the throat and tapering to a long point as it reaches the waist line. Skillfully managed this trimming takes the full width of the vest out of the stout woman's figure; the lines of it arrest the eye and wheedle it out of gauging the bust or waist measure.



TRICK BODICES.

Now and then there is a woman who is too long waisted. For her also the trick bodice is extremely useful. It borrows ribbons by the handful, rather narrow ribbons that it may use more of them, fastens these on either side at the under arm seam and ties them in front in flyaway bows, the rows of them reaching from the waist to the bust and taking several inches off the distance between hips and shoulders. The principle on which these modifications of the figure are accomplished is a part of the A B C of art and yet it is something which comparatively few women ever seem to understand. The rule to put it in a sentence is that if you do not want to have the eye measure a vertical line you should attract its attention by horizontal lines and vice versa.

The hips call occasionally for the same fooling of the visual organ. The lank girl whose skirts will scarce hang on her has recourse to an easy disguise. Again it is ribbons which are called into play, inch wide ribbons which are laid back and forth in loops, making an airy fairy ruffle just at the lower edge of the bodice. A sash about the hips instead of the waist answers the same purpose often. To make the hips smaller instead of larger is a trick not so easy. A girdle which is of medium width at the waist but dwindles to a mere line under the arm has a good effect occasionally.

To reduce the apparent size of the bust is one of the feats of the trick bodice. This is most readily accomplished by means of the Directory costume. The side flaps of the jacket, coat or redingote casque are made a trifle wider in the region of the waist line than common. The rich and delicate needlework or raised embroidery, which is the usual ornament, is put on in graduated rows, one row beginning at the collar and running down the front, a second joining it presently, then a third, and so on, until there are six or seven at the bottom of the jacket. The weight of the braided edge makes the jacket fronts hang gracefully, and the increased emphasis given to the lower portion draws the attention irresistibly from the fleshy redundancy above.

The "dumpy" woman thoroughly appreciates the disguises of the trimmed bodice, especially if it is her back which is too short for the rest of her figure. Backs have been until this season incorrigible, but the new bodices are complaisant enough to admit very pronounced lines of piping or embroidery following the seams in contrasting colors and so destroying the appearance of disproportionate breadth that you would think some positive change had taken place in the figure.

The sleeve is an opportunity and a source of danger. A woman who is thin can work wonders with a loose and wrinkling or a stuffed sleeve. It lends roundness to the whole upper part of the body. I have seen positive meagreness almost redeemed by a sleeve which was gathered full on the shoulder and tied with ribbons at the elbows.

Even the tight coat sleeve can be made to assist in such a deception. A triangular bit of velvet inserted at the shoulder seam and tapering to a point on the outside of the arm will materially plumpen its contour. The stout woman cannot too strenuously avoid the shoulder puff or indeed any fulness to the upper part of the sleeve. It will make her look broader where she is broad enough by nature.

It is strange that the tricks of the bodice are not more generally and intelligently employed. Stout women, who, above all others, need them, do not seem once in a thousand times to dress with any tact or consideration. They encourage the dressmaker to squeeze them in a hydraulic press until they gasp for breath, but this crude attempt ends their efforts to look smaller. They will stand improperly, they will promenade Broadway in brilliant colors that make them monstrous, they will subject themselves to the merciless revelations of the tailor gown, they will groan under their avoirdupois, but they show neither originality nor adaptiveness in making the best of the circumstances and finding the lines of dignity that are possible for full figures.

Every gown nowadays gets its character from its corsage. The skirt is flat, scant, clinging, a mere appendage; whose cut and dried lines are the stock-in-trade of the dressmaker. The bodice is significant in every line and fold. It has expression, it has individuality, it ought to suit itself exactly to the particular woman who puts it on. The bodice this summer is the gown, the skirt that hangs from it is a secondary or tertiary consideration. This being the case, one may get some inspiration on the vexed question of how to cut one's bodice from a dress in which Mrs. William Waldorf Astor appeared at a small and early some evenings ago. The design is a modestly decollete corsage of the palest gray green tulle cut in a simple round waist with front laid in straight folds, confined by a broad draped belt of soft gray green silk coming well up under the arms. The sleeves are full puffs of tulle, gathered into a silk band just above the elbow. A trail of pale pink briar roses comes across the bust from the left shoulder to the waist line, and a wide pink ribbon is tied around the throat under the right ear.

This is what Mrs. Willis Ward, the friend of Mrs. Cleveland, has worn two or three times on shopping expeditions this summer. Over a full gathered skirt of bluish gray and white striped washing silk, set with as many as twenty rows of narrow white ribbons, comes a Directory coat of the same material, with large pockets set very far back and finished with silver buttons. It has very deep revers and a broad collar turning back over the shoulders. In front there shows a long incroyable waistcoat of white surah which comes down over the hips and which also has pockets and lapels. About the throat is a broad collar of white embroidery from under which falls a lace jabot.

An odd bodice is one which the wife of William Chase, the artist, devised for her own wear. Two crossed kerchiefs form the surplice front, one being of glowing red crepe de chine and the other of glistening silver gauze. The bizarre effect is heightened by the sleeves, one of which is red and the other white and silver.

FINE GEORGIA MARBLE.

Marble Quarries That Are Literally Worth More Than a Gold Mine.

In Pickens County, Ga., there are now the most extensive marble quarries on the continent, and an industry is being built up surpassing by far in extent and value that of the famous marble quarries of Vermont. The story of the development of these quarries is a romantic one, and it has just been told in an exhaustive account by that entertaining newspaper writer, Amos J. Cummings. Six years ago S. C. Demont, a Chicago [illegible], and Frank Tidball, a Philadelphia soap man, were riding in a car on a Georgia railroad. The former in reading a copy of a newspaper noticed the repetition of the word "marble," and he gave the article a careful reading. It asserted positively that there was a vast vein of the finest marble outcropping at a certain place along Long Swamp Creek valley. Demont, who had been raised in Vermont near the marble quarries and who knew their value, called Tidball's attention to the matter and they agreed to go forthwith and examine the vein. They first found E. P. Howell, famous as the "cool" editor of the Atlanta Constitution, who went with them and showed them the place where the marble outcropped. It was on a farm which had been bought for a song sixty years ago by a man named Tate, who was overseer of a plantation and who found the marble while roaming in the woods, gun in hand. He held the land till his death, and he charged his sons never to sell it, no matter what happened, declaring that the day would come when it would be worth more than a gold mine. When, therefore, Demont and Tidball tried to buy the land the sons absolutely refused, remembering their father's injunction, but they leased the quarry for a high royalty. The two men then formed a big corporation and bought up all the adjoining land. An immense capital has since been invested by them and the quarry developed. The vein of marble has proved to be 2,000 feet wide and traced for two miles and a half. Nothing but marble has been found after boring 125 feet. It is a solid mass, with not a crack in it. A cube the size of the Washington monument could be sawed from it. Solid triangles the size of the Egyptian pyramids could be cut from the prodigious mass of the purest marble. The marble is of wonderful texture, fine and strong, and when sawed into slabs an inch in thickness it is fully as translucent as ordinary stained glass. It is of all colors, but there is a pure white marble which is of surpassing beauty and susceptible of exquisite polish. It is shipped all over the United States, and is fast breaking down the monopoly so long enjoyed by the Vermont quarries. The principal stockholders of the company are making immense fortunes, and the sons of the far-sighted old Georgia man now receive $1,[illegible] monthly royalty.

ONLY HER SIXTH.

The Matrimonial Ventures of a Modern Philadelphia Woman.

"My man is too busy to come himself, so please give me a marriage certificate," said (as related by a Philadelphia paper) a chipper dame of not more than thirty-two years—as men guess ages—as she stepped into the marriage license clerk's office one day last week.

"Certainly," said the polite clerk. He reached for a pile of papers and, looking at the calendar, remarked: "Ninth."

"No, only the sixth," put in the female.

"Then I'm wrong," replied the clerk.

"Yes, you are; I've only had five, and this is the sixth," said the woman, to the clerk's surprise.

"Oh, I meant the day of the month," laughingly replied the clerk.

"This one is a darling and I'll try and raise him," said the woman. "He's a clerk in a dry-goods store, and he never sits down for fear he'll crease his pantaloons and make them bag at the knees. But I'll give him a lesson. I'm in awful hard luck with men. Soon as I get them fixed I lose them. No. 1 was such a nice man. He died with consumption. When he died he had seven yards of porous plaster wrapped around him. No. 2 was a very nice man. He worked in Dupont's powder factory. Just my luck. When he was blown up there was not enough of him left to make a hair locket. No. 3 was also a nice man. He followed the sea, and they tell me a whale swallowed him up. No. 4 was a nice man, too. He was a book agent. Oh, he could talk so sweet. I used to sit by the hour and listen to him. He bought a divorce out in Illinois and sent it to me. No. 5 was a nice man. I worshiped that fellow. He got to be a politician and stayed out late at the caucuses. He said he was trying to get a contract to clean the streets, and dear knows they need it, don't they? Well, he died of enlargement of the head. Now, hurry up with that paper. No. 6 is such a nice fellow, but he might change his mind."

She took the paper and hurried up to the store, and when No. 6 came out he marched off to his doom.

AMERICAN FOLK-LORE.

A Special Study of More Than Ordinary Interest.

"The American Folk-Lore Society" is the name of an association of literary men and scholars organized for the study of folk-lore and the collection and publication of the legends and traditions of North America. The society, in order to keep its members posted, publishes a journal of a scientific character, containing contributions from some of the best-known American writers.

The collection of American traditions, as it is conducted by this society, will—even when but partially completed—be of great value to students of anthropology, and librarians, universities, historical societies and collectors of Americana are urged to consider whether they ought not to promote the collection of American traditions, as a National duty. To gather materials for history, which are indispensable for anthropological record, and which, unless recorded, will in a few years have irretrievably perished, must have precedence over the collation of historical records already safely lodged in libraries.

A WEALTHY HERMIT.

He Has Plenty of Money, But Lives in a Hole in the Ground.

On the Winnebago Indian reservation, about twenty miles down the Missouri river from Sioux City, Ia., in Thurston County, Neb., dwells a hermit whose history is of much interest. His name is Charles Ebes, and he is forty-nine years old. He lives alone, not in a hut or cave, but in a hole in the ground, having dug an apartment in the earth about ten feet from the surface to the floor. This is entered by a trap door, which is only about two feet square and which can not be seen until a person is close to it. His habitation is in a rough, wooded gully running back among the clay bluffs of the Missouri river and is very seldom visited by men. Your correspondent has visited the place and has heard Ebes' story. He is a native of Indiana, and in 1862, when twenty-two years old, he was working at the cooper's trade at Vincennes, Ind. He was engaged to be married to a young lady named Minnie Garrett, whose parents lived near that city. In the spring of that year Miss Garrett's parents moved to New Ulm, Minn., and settled on a farm on what was then the frontier. Soon after they arrived at their new home the girl wrote to Ebes that she was dissatisfied with the place and wanted to go back to Indiana. The lover was without means, except his wages, but he saved what he earned for several months, and that, together with the price of a colt that he owned, made a little over $[illegible]. With this he planned to go to Minnesota, marry the girl and take her back to the old home, and he wrote her that he would start on the Monday morning after the date of the letter. On the night before he was to start he went out with a company of young men, visited a gambling house, and when daylight came he was penniless, having bet and lost every cent. Then he was compelled to write to his intended and postpone his visit and the wedding, but set again to work, planning to go in the latter part of September, when he should have saved up money enough. Before he again heard from Miss Garrett the Sioux Indians had attacked the white settlement at New Ulm, and the girl and her parents were among the killed. When Ebes heard this story he was broken-hearted, left his work and began to roam about the country. He visited New Ulm, and found the story was too true. In 18[illegible] he went back to Vincennes, and there was apprised of the fact that an uncle in Tennessee had died and left him nearly $[illegible]. He secured the money and spent about $[illegible] in traveling about seeking a place to locate, but found it impossible to settle down among his fellow-men. In 1872 he invested his money in bonds and for two years he lived a hermit's life in Wisconsin. In 18[illegible] he came farther west, and since then he has lived in the hole in the ground, where he will probably spend the remainder of his days. Besides the bonds that bring him a regular income, he has a good bank account in a Sioux City bank, and he draws on this for the scanty needs of his house and home. He has a fair education and has many books with which he whiles away the time in his lonely habitation, which is so dark that he keeps a lamp burning night and day. His only companions are two tame badgers, which he keeps in a box in one corner of his dirt den.

THE WOODEN INDIAN.

How He Is Carved Out of Pine in Defiance of Nature.

A Maker of Cigar Signs Tells the Secrets of His Trade—Splendor, Rather Than Fidelity to Nature, His Object—A Neglected Art.

"There, Pop, I've got all done but the top. What color shall I paint that?" The spectacled wood-carver looked up from the bit of cardboard that he was lettering and said, in answer to his son's interruption: "Paint the head red, Jimmy." Jimmy, a lad of thirteen, with symptoms of incipient painter's colic, was devoting his best energies and the last fifteen minutes before dinner to the decoration of a wooden squaw in colors whose brilliancy and variety would have shamed the splendors of the first rainbow. The little shop was a sort of tawdry statuary hall, resplendent with the gorgeous presence of half a dozen cigar-store Indians in various states of incompleteness. A tall squaw, having a coral face as yet unadorned with eyes, occupied a conspicuous place in the room; her drapery, consisting of a yellow blanket and a red buffalo robe, skillfully arranged so as to display a swelling bosom and a pair of monstrous calves. "A special order," said the wood-carver to a New York Star reporter, "the man would have that buffalo robe red because he thought it would attract attention."

"Our business might be called artistic," he continued, "but there isn't much money into it. Years ago, when I was a young apprentice, I had the honor of making two fine ship figureheads. They represented parties standin' full length, with scrolls in their hands. I don't know who the parties was and I don't know the names of the ships, but I was proud of the job. That sort of business, though, dropped off fifteen years ago. The American people is economical to the detriment of art, and our business isn't appreciated as it ought to be. I do little or nothing now but make and repair Indians and other carvings with sentiments such as them."

The carver spoke with the air of a man whose art had been prostituted to the sordid demands of trade. He set no store by the Indians turned out in whole tribes, and fashioned with small regard for the truth of nature. "They don't look like Indians, you know," he said, with amiable frankness. "No Indian ever had features like that big fellow there, and I reckon there never was a squaw who dressed like that one with the red buffalo robe. If we made 'em like real Indians they'd be too ugly to sell. We have no models, but just keep on making them as they've been made for the last fifty years. The idea is to make them look pretty and to work in as many colors as possible. Sometimes we get seven or eight different tints, besides gilding. What are they made of? White pine. It works easy. We hack 'em out with saw and hatchet, rough 'em up with big tools and polish 'em off with finer implements. Jimmy, show the gentleman the logs in the cellar."

Jimmy promptly led the way to the underground lumber room, where lay half a dozen great pine logs from sixteen to twenty-four feet in length. Against the wall leaned a rudely-hacked piece of timber that looked like a damaged gate-post. Jimmy averred that in time this would be a splendid squaw, with a painted skirt and a headdress of plumes. He pointed out where each leg would be, which way the face would turn and how the arms would appear. The figure, limbs, pedestal and all were carved from the single log in one piece. It did not seem to contain the promise and potency of the cleverly carved figures in the shop above, but Jimmy had faith that he and his father would yet evolve from the unsightly log a comely squaw of conventional pattern.

"It takes from six to sixteen days to make one of those figures," said the master of the shop, taking up the thread of his discourse. "The simpler ones can be whittled out in three days and painted in three more. The big, complicated figures, with tomahawks and wampum necklaces and beaded bows, take a week or more, and the painting requires nearly as long. That squaw, you see, isn't the right color for a squaw. That's only the groundwork. We've got to paint her copper color to-morrow. Then we've got to put in her eyes. They may be blue, gray or brown. After that comes the fine work on the feather headdress. Nobody cares much what they look like, so they're showy, and that's the thing that makes 'em sell. What do they cost? From $15 to $[illegible]. A good Indian, well taken care of, will last thirty years. Once a year he ought to be sent back for repairs. Taste in Indians does not change much, and my customers trust to me to do the thing right. Yes, we deal in second-hand Indians," he continued, glancing up at the faded splendors of a squaw, over whose arm the wood-carver's street coat was hung for want of a better clothes-rack.

"When a man moves to a new place he sometimes gets a fresh Indian. We take the old one off his hands and sell it to some small dealer. We used to make negroes from '[illegible] to about '[illegible], but later they got unpopular. Then the girl of the period and the Grecian bend had a go; but mostly the trade runs steady on Indians. Going? Well, you may say the business is dull, though it might be worse; but on the whole, the public doesn't appreciate our art as it once did."

A DRUMMER'S TALE.

Queer Streaks of Human Nature Run Across by Knights of the Grip.

A traveling man's experience would make a racy story if he had the time and disposition to write it out. For instance, I will mention an adventure I had some years ago down in Indian Territory, says W. D. McClanahan in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. It was late in the fall season when I had finished working Texas that I met a fellow-traveler at Denison who told me that a certain party in the Territory had been making anxious inquiries about me, that he wanted a nice bill of holiday goods, and that I should be sure and call on my way north. With this pointer I checked my trunk to the town where my anxious friend was located. I arrived Sunday afternoon, and after supper dropped in, as it were, by chance, and greeted my would-be customer pleasantly. After setting up the cigars we talked pleasantly for an hour or so without any mention of business. I left saying I would see him next morning. After an early breakfast I called and stated that I had a big line of goods and would be glad to show him my layout. He replied that he was going to market soon, and it would be time wasted on him. This was a damper on me, but I thought he was playing to see if I had received his message, so I changed the subject and acted as if I believed his statement that he was going to the city. The train was to leave at ten o'clock. Nine o'clock came and I was beginning to get fidgety. Again I referred to my fine line of samples, but still he insisted that he did not wish to place an order. As the clock struck 9:30 I shook hands all around and started for the train. He said good-bye, coolly, and feeling very much disgusted I sought the depot. Just as I was checking my baggage my customer came puffing and blowing up and asked what I meant. I explained that as he was the only customer in the town and he wanted no goods there was no use for me to stay longer. "Send your trunks back," said he, "I only didn't want you to see I was anxious to buy." He was afraid I wouldn't give him close prices. Some men are built that way, you see.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Rheumatism and Neuralgia

These twin diseases cause untold suffering. Doctors admit that they are difficult to cure—so do their patients. Paine's Celery Compound has permanently cured the worst cases of rheumatism and neuralgia—so say those who have used it.

"Having been troubled with rheumatism at the knee and foot for five years, I was almost unable to get around, and was very often confined to my bed for weeks at a time. I used only one bottle of Paine's Celery Compound, and was perfectly cured. I can now jump around, and feel as lively as a boy." FRANK CARROLL, Eureka, Nevada.

"Paine's Celery Compound has been a God send to me. For the past two years I have suffered with neuralgia of the heart, doctor after doctor failing to cure me. I have now taken nearly four bottles of the Compound, and am free from the complaint. I feel very grateful to you." CHAS. H. LEWIS, Central Village, Ct.

Paine's Celery Compound

"I have been greatly afflicted with acute rheumatism, and could find no relief until I used Paine's Celery Compound. After using six bottles of this medicine I am now cured of rheumatic troubles." SAMUEL HUTCHINSON, So. Cornish, N. H.

Effects Lasting Cures.

Paine's Celery Compound has performed many other cures as marvelous as these,—copies of letters sent to any address. Pleasant to take, does not disturb, but aids digestion, and entirely vegetable; a child can take it. What's the use of suffering longer with rheumatism or neuralgia?

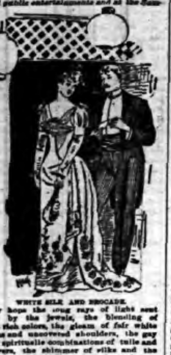
THE SEASON'S DELIGHTS.

Toilets for the Hops at the Summer Hotels.

Picturesque Dancing Gowns for Matrons and for Maids—White Brocade and Iris-brocade—The Witchery of Lace and the Poetry of Flowers.

COPYRIGHT, 1889.

The most brilliant display of beauty and fashion to be seen in midsummer is witnessed in the ball room of a great summer hotel at one of the fashionable resorts when the evening is well under way and the dance music sounds. There seems to be a continually increasing tendency towards more richness of dress at all public entertainments and at the summer hops the long rays of light sent out by the jewels, the blending of soft rich colors, the gleam of fair white arms and uncovered shoulders, the gay and spirituelle combinations of tulle and flowers, the shimmer of silks and the splendor of brocades make a picture bright with color and variety.

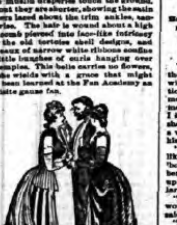


WHITE SILK AND BROCADE.

White is the principal wear, as it has been in London and Paris throughout the season, and diamonds blaze from the hair, the neck and the front of the gown. Often the portion of the bodice that is trimmed with lace from shoulder to shoulder is one mass of gems and more than one great lady wears a diamond stomacher. It cannot be said that the glitter of so many jewels is universally becoming. The flashing, glowing, scintillating suns of life and light and color suit only a moderate proportion of faces and those of the more dignified and stately order. However, there is an imposing appearance about the sparkle of so many jewels that prevents one examining too nicely into the mere becomingness of the display.

A notable feature of the hop gown is its revolt against New York conventionalism. In August in the ball room we get for the first time the Empire and Directory fashions unsubdued, unmodernized, not reduced to rigid uniformity by dressmakers' rule. New York is not a picturesque city; it has been under the dominion of the tailor gown too long. New York hates the suspicion of being extreme. It takes the Directory coat and makes an old-fashioned polonaise of it; it takes the Josephine robe and turns it into a prim bodice with a broad sash. But the casino is unterrified. The casino turns the summer corsage into something so shirred and folded and puckered, gathered up so softly about the shoulders like a baby's waist over a white guimpe or flying back from a waistcoat of white, heavy with gold embroidery, so jauntily that it becomes as beautifully incomprehensible as one of Robert Browning's most esoteric poems.

The casino delights in soft, silky, yellowish India muslin, and indeed it is a beautiful material on a girl with a delicate complexion and dark hair and eyes. The casino likes to see it made with the waist high up under the arms, and edged with a yellowish lace about the shoulders. The sleeves have a round puff above, kept in form by fine wire hoops inside, and the rest fits loosely to the curves of the arm like the wrinkled top of a glove. The skirts are extremely narrow and are finished very probably with scallops of gold thread. Above these are embroidered rose garlands festooned in graceful curves with knots and fluttering ribbons. In the back these muslin draperies touch the ground. In front they are shorter, showing the satin slippers laced about the trim ankles, sandal-wise. The hair is wound about a high gold comb pierced into lace-like intricacy after the old tortoise shell designs, and bandeaux of narrow white ribbons confine the little bunches of curls hanging over the temples. This belle carries no flowers, but she wields with a grace that might have been learned at the Fan Academy an exquisite gauze fan.



CASINO TOILETS FOR AUGUST.

The decollete gown is conducting itself with moderation. Now and then one sees a narrow ribbon or a strip of gauze doing duty for a shoulder, but as a rule the bodice is cut higher in a pretty heart-shaped outline, and sleeves require no microscope to bring them into view. They have a quaint and pretty fashion at Saratoga of draping the bodice on a sultry summer evening. A very long scarf of tulle or lace is carried around the throat, leaving a bit of white skin exposed just under the chin. The scarf is fastened here and there with little glistening gem-set lace pins, and then brought down a trifle below the waist and the airy folds caught in snugly under a large clasp or buckle. The long straight ends are simply hemmed, and these often reach to the foot of the gown.

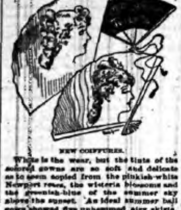
Another pretty and popular fancy is to let in long scarfs of silk muslin to the seams at the back of the bodice and bring them round over the shoulders like fichus, tying them upon the bosom and letting the sash ends hang on the skirt. A lovely gown of this kind, well suited to the graceful girl who wore it, was seen a week ago; the material was a rich white and silver brocade opening over a front of tulle, the outer veil of which was lightly and delicately embroidered in silver. The scarfs were of silver threaded tulle, edged about with small silver tassels giving the most picturesque effect imaginable.

Another dress which attracted general attention on the dancing floor was a Greek gown of a delicate golden green crape, with embroidered border of pale pink roses. The chiton, or long shawl, draped over this was of the faintest amber brown silk tulle. The loose folds streamed like the hair of a wind goddess as the music waxed mad, but draped in statuesque lines again as soon as the Maid of Athens was still. White, embroidered with pink or blue, is a favorite color for these popular Greek gowns.

A flower-like girl bloomed in a dress that was meant to last that evening only. A web of anemone pink gauze hung about her, the color hardly as deep as the faintest tint on the sea shell. This diaphanous cloud was nearly covered with natural flowers, the fine shimmering blooms that New Englanders call "babies' breath" being the blossoms chosen. The wreath on her hair was of the same posies and diamonds in invisible settings were strewn over the flowers and shone like the dew at sunrise. No cooler and more aerial toilet has been seen this summer, but the few hours that were the limit of the fresh loveliness of the blossoms were all that it was expected to serve.

A weird kind of a ball dress was made of a soft ribbed yellow silk, very severe and plain. From the shoulders depended a long scarf drapery of a misty, gray green crape. It passed from the shoulders to the waist and was left so loose that it did not disguise one curve of the form. It hung from the shoulders in long shawl draperies trailing behind on the floor.

Artistic simplicity is with the buds the order of the day. White muslin, the girlish fabric that Miss Edgeworth's and Miss Austin's and Washington Irving's heroines affected is once again the very height of the style, and it is made in the most youthful manner possible. The more juvenile and ingenuous the debutante can look the more closely she approaches her ideal. The muslin is frequently that exquisite silk muslin which falls in such graceful folds. It is made in Empire fashion with the border finished in daisy petals or edged with a band of embroidery in Greek designs. The bodice is folded softly across the bosom and has no garniture but a broad muslin sash which may be five, six or seven yards long. If the debutante is slender, it is wound about her waist two or three times and then tied at the back in an enormous bow with long ends. The sash of this season is simply distracting. The debutante tilts and unties under it much as the 3-year-old did three or four seasons ago.



NEW COIFFURES.

White is the wear, but the tints of the colored gowns are so soft and delicate as to seem copied from the pinkish-white Newport roses, the wisteria blossoms and the greenish-blue of the summer sky above the sunset. An ideal summer ball gown showed five unhemmed airy skirts, one above another, all of a faint blue gauze, with pink hedge foliage bordering the fourth and veiled by the fifth hanging over them. Each skirt fell straight all around from a bodice of pompadour brocade in patterns of roses and leaves on a bluish-white ground. This bodice is half low in the neck, with elbow sleeves and and shoulder and corsage sprays of ferns and wild roses.

Another gown bringing in the witchery of lace and delicate textures was of lilac crepe and creamy embroidered net falling in straight folds at the back; on one side was a floral panel, the blossoms embroidered in silks of the softest hues brightened with gold thread and combined with that subtle art which we have copied from the Orientals, which subdues the tinting only to enhance the effect. This embroidery was repeated on the edge of the skirt, where it was partly veiled by a lace flounce headed by a ruche of crepe from which fell a cascade of pink and lilac ribbon. The coat bodice was of embroidered net, the lace basque of which formed a peplum, knotted behind. The lace revers showed an embroidered waistcoat barred by three rows of pink and lilac ribbon. The full sleeves reached just to the bend of the arm and were edged with lace and trimmed with small bows of ribbon.

Heavy gold embroidery appears on the beautiful white cashmere and veiling evening gowns. Fine white cashmere draped over a gold-embroidered white silk skirt makes the prettiest combination of materials possible. Plain tulle, it is fair to say, has entirely superseded the fancy and beaded kinds. Some of the richest summer evening gowns are of black gauze or lace or net over black silk and gold or silver embroidered.

The hair is no longer dressed in the towering aigrette-adorned puffs of a year ago. A low classic knot bound with a fillet, a simple knot at the back of the neck, an arrangement of braids on the back of the head with curls twisting about the neck and ears, these and a dozen low and half low arrangements admitting the use of flowers and ribbons are the summer styles.

The summer sorties-de-bal are gorgeous, some of them being made of thin white materials like veiling or challi adorned with cascades of lace and tied with ribbons.

AL RICKER GOT SQUARE.

But the Drug Business Was Ruined in Blakeville, Me.

He Paralyzes the Business of a Rival, But Kills off the Customers in the Town. Revenge Is Sweet But It Takes a Business Head to Steer It.

COPYRIGHT, 1889.

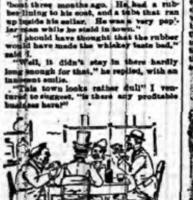
Way down on the Maine coast, where the dampness of the sea fog struggles with the dryness of prohibitory legislation I met a long, thin man who mistook me for a drummer. I know that he mistook me for a drummer because he asked me if I had a flask concealed in my clothing. I shook my head sadly, and he gasped with a violence that rattled the dry lining of his throat.

"There was a man that looked a sight like you," said he, "that was around here 'bout three months ago. He had a rubber lining to his coat, and a tube that ran up inside his collar. He was a very pop'lar man while he staid in town."

"I should have thought that the rubber would have made the whiskey taste bad," said I.

"Well, it didn't stay in there hardly long enough for that," he replied, with an innocent smile.

"This town looks rather dull" I ventured to suggest, "is there any profitable business here?"



SOUR MASH IN AL'S DRUG STORE.

"No; there aint none now," he said sadly, "There used to be money in the drug store, here, but Al Ricker ruined that, he was the druggist you know—hung himself a year ago this month. That's his store up on the Main street."

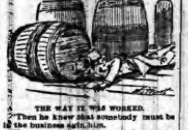
"Why don't somebody take Ricker's old shop and open it up, if there's so much money in drugs? I shouldn't mind doing it myself."

"Don't you do it young feller," he said, solemnly. "Thar ain't nothin' in it, an' I'll tell ye why. Ye see when Al Ricker struck this town 'bout six year ago he was obleeged to remain. He only had money enough to take him half way to the next town which is tother side 'o the bay, had old Cap'n Hellom wouldn't a carried him a boat's length beyond his fare if the water'd been a hundred fathom deep where he'd had to get out. So Al stopped.

"He had to do something to make a livin' so he went clerkin' for old Dan Harris that kep' the drug store then. Al didn't know much about drugs, but he played a powerful good hand o' forty-five, an' he an' the old man used to go cahoots on the game in the back room, nights. Well, sir; the old man didn't live six weeks, an' havin' no folks he left the whole outfit to Al. That feller did have the dog derndest luck, 'specially on his own deal, but I always thought that the old man died fair enough.

"The mornin' arter the old man was laid away, Al came to me, an' sez he: 'I s'pose I've got to run this shebang, though I dunno no more about drugs than a cow?' An' it was a fact, he didn't know anise of seeds from a stomach pump. But I told him it didn't make no difference what he sold so long as he looked out for the bottles that the old man had marked poison, an' kept a good quality o' sour mash in the back room—an' Al was a good judge o' whiskey, I will say that for him, an' he never made a fuss about a feller's pourin' out a good thick drink. But Al was scared to have the drugs around, so he traded 'em all off with the doctor for the price of enough sugar to fill up the bottles that had solid stuff in 'em. The others he filled with Allen's General Restorer, a patent medicine that he bought of a drummer for 37½ cents a gallon. It was harmless stuff an' it came in nine different colors so that women that got tired o' takin' blue medicine year after year could have red or yaller for a change. Customers that didn't like to buy much got the Restorer, an' others got the sour mash or perhaps a mixture. I used to find that the corn juice with a little blue Restorer made a very handsome remedy for almost anything.

"What with the sour mash an' the Restorer an' the forty-five Al did a rushin' business an' I'm bound to say that the general health o' the community was never better. So it went on for more'n four years, an' Al was layin' up money when, kind o' sudden like, he noticed a fallin' off in his trade. The Restorer sold as well as ever, but the back room wasn't so full nights. Some of his best customers were droppin' off. There wasn't no temperance revival goin' on nor anything o' that kind an' Al was puzzled. He thought perhaps they'd taken to goin' right home after prayer meetin' or the lodge, so he watched for some of 'em, but no; they came home just as late an' seemed to require as much of the sidewalk as ever.



THE WAY IT WAS WORKED.

"Then he knew that somebody must be in the business agin him.

"It took Al a long time to find out who it was. He kept asking people but o' course they wouldn't tell. At last he tracked Deacon Stevens one night and saw him go into Dosser's ship chandler's store. That settled the place, but it was a mystery how Dosser got the stuff into town. The law's very strict about bringing in any except for medicinal purposes, and there's just enough cold water cranks in town to seize any stuff that couldn't give an account of itself. It's pretty hard to smuggle whiskey in with rope or oakum or staves, and that was about all that Dosser bought. Al might have stopped Dosser's business by puttin' the law and order people on to him, but he was afraid that would wake 'em up too much so he just lay low and watched.

"One day thar was a schooner came in and brought some freight for Dosser. The stuff was put out on the wharf and lay there over night. After it was dark Al went down there an' nosed around. Who should he see but Deacon Stevens poking around among some casks of white lead. There was a little moon and Al could watch the operation. Pretty soon the Deacon got out an augur and ran it into the cask a couple of times. Then he got out a straw.

"'Jingo,' said Al, coming out from his hiding place, 'didn't you know white lead was pizen?'

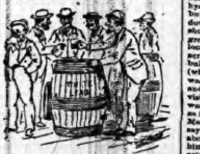
"'Derned slow pizen, this is,' said the Deacon, 'or you an' I'd a been dead long ago.'

"That put Al onto the snap. He went home an' debated some time with himself whether he'd give Dosser away, but finally it seemed better not to do it. He allowed a better plan would be to ruin his business in some other way, an' by an' by he got up what he allowed was a first rate plan. He bided his time, an' by an' by, when Dosser was goin' to have another load o' stuff come Al telegraphed up to Boston an' had a case o' genuine white lead put in with the cargo.

"The vessel got in all right and the freight was shoved out on the wharf. By that time pretty near all of Al's best customers had heard of the little game that had been played by Stevens the night Al caught him, so the day Dosser's second vessel hove in sight there was probably more augurs bought in this town than there ever was before or will be again. The night came on dark. I don't mind tellin' you that I was the first man on the wharf. I had just got the cask up onto two single sawbucks, and was puttin' in my augur when somebody came along an' scared me away. Just in time, by jingo. Mysterious are the workings of Providence. I hid behind a post an' watched the proceedings. The man that had scared me was Stevens. He was always a lazybones, an' when he saw the cask up on the sawbucks he got a great scheme. He just bore his air hole in the top an' then lay down with his head under the cask an' bored straight up into the keg holdin' his mouth open. I saw a little of the stuff trickle out an' then the Deacon rolled away into the darkness mighty sudden.

"I wondered at his gettin' satisfied so soon. It did not go well with what I knew of him, but just then I saw another man coming so I supposed the Deacon was getting out of the way. It did not take the other fellow two seconds to tumble to the game and he got right down where the Deacon had been. I heard him say something wicked an' then he too rolled out o' sight. That must be mighty bad whiskey, I thought to myself.

"In half a minute there was another feller at it, an' for half or three-quarters of an hour they kept at it pretty steady, so that when I finally got a chance to come out the cask was empty. I tumbled over two or three men on my way up the wharf, but I supposed they'd sleep it off before mornin'. But by Jimmy Neddy, they never did sleep it off for when the morning dawned the best people in this town was scattered all over the wharf thick, I tell ye, and they were the deadest set o' men I ever experienced.



PASSING AROUND THE WHISKEY.

"Well, it ruined Dosser, and Al had a few brief days o' triumph while his rival was bein' driven out o' town. Then he got down one day and thought it all over and, as I said before, he hung himself."

"Remorse, I suppose, drove him to it," said I.

"Remorse?" echoed the stranger, "well I don't know much about remorse, but don't you see what the derned fool had done? He'd killed off nearly all his best customers. He might a' got 'em back from Dosser but the cold and clammy tomb is another matter. No, sir; he was ruined himself, and there's the moral of it. Young man, revenge is sweet but it takes a business head to steer it."

HOWARD FIELDING.

The Italian Parliament.

The Italian Parliament consists of two houses—the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies. The Senate is composed of princes of the royal house who are of age, and of an unlimited number of members, above 40 years old, nominated by the King for life. The lower house has 508 members elected by ballot on a franchise comprising all male citizens over 21 years of age who can read and write, and who pay taxes to the amount of nineteen lire per annum. Neither Senators nor deputies receive any salary, but are allowed to travel free throughout Italy by rail or from port to port in the kingdom by steamer. The duration of Parliament is five years, but they may be dissolved by the King at any time.

He Had Attempted to Dissuade Them.

A Berlin Judge, the other day, addressing a locksmith who appeared as a witness, spoke as follows:

"I should have thought you would dissuade your workmen from going to law for such a trifle."

Witness—That's what I did. I said: "Children," said I, "the clerk of the lawyer's will take your coat, and the lawyer will strip off your shirt, and, as for the judge, why, man, he'll skin you alive!" You see, I talked sensibly to the folks like that, but it was all of no use!

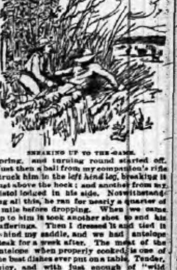
LOADED FOR ANTELOPE.

How to Get Within Gun Shot of the Game.

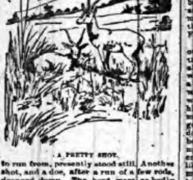
The Best Rifle for Antelope Hunting—They Are Hard to Kill—A Few Well Selected Antelope Yarns. The Game Thinned Out.

COPYRIGHT, 1889.

As an old plainsman once said to me, "If you are going to hunt antelope much, go and buy a lead mine first," and my own experience would almost warrant following his advice. They will carry off more lead and not seem to feel it, than any other animal that I know of. Here is an instance of what a tremendous amount of lead they can carry. One day a neighboring ranchman and myself were riding home from the stage station, where we had been for our mail. As we got to the top of a little hill we saw a bunch of six antelope just ahead of us. I wanted some fresh meat at the ranch, so pulled my six-shooter and fired at the leader, a big buck. The ball (a 44 calibre Colt's) struck him in the right shoulder, breaking the bone and rendering that leg useless. He gave a spring, and turning round started off. Just then a ball from my companion's rifle struck him in the left hind leg, breaking it just above the hock; and another from my pistol lodged in his side. Notwithstanding all this, he ran for nearly a quarter of a mile before dropping. When we came up to him it took another shot to end his sufferings. Then I dressed it and tied it behind my saddle, and we had antelope steak for a week after. The meat of the antelope when properly cooked is one of the best dishes ever put on a table. Tender, juicy, and with just enough of "wild taste" to give it a flavor, it is far ahead of beef or any domestic meat. Visit almost any ranch in the Western country, and hanging to the meat pole you will see the whole or quarter of an antelope. At meal time you will get a piece of it, cooked in a style peculiar to the country; and after you have got back to civilization again, you will wish many times for a piece of properly cooked antelope steak. The fall of the year is the best time to hunt antelope, as they have been feeding on the nutritious grasses during the summer, and are fat and in good condition. As to weapons it is hard to choose any particular kind. Fancy has a great deal to with the matter. I prefer for all around use, the 40-70 Winchester repeating rifle, while some use a Martini of the same calibre, still others use telescope rifles of different makes, and some old hunters use an old battered single-shot Pacific Ballard and it is due to the latter to say that they generally "git thar," when it comes to bringing down game at long range. I came across an old fellow in a greasy buckskin suit, one day, who was hunting for the market. He would kill and dress enough to load two wagons, then take them to Cheyenne or Denver and dispose of the whole lot to the commission men or butchers. He was just going out for some game a short distance away, so I went with him. He had a single-shot "Sharp's" rifle, 40 bore, and a telescope attachment on the barrel. The advantage of the telescope is that it brings the game near to your eye, and by sighting your game through it, and bringing the hair sights on the end, to bear in the proper place, you are sure of your game almost every time. Arriving at the foot of a small slope above which was a flat plain, we dismounted, and crawled to the top. Peering over the edge we saw a bunch of seventeen antelope feeding. The old fellow laid flat, poked his rifle over the edge of the hill, squinted through the telescope and fired. A big buck sprung into the air and fell dead. The others seemed frightened and disturbed, but, not seeing us or anything to run from, presently stood still. Another shot, and a doe, after a run of a few rods, dropped down. The herd were as badly rattled as before. A shot, a death, an hysterical running about for a little time, but seeing nothing they soon quieted down. The old hunter kept squinting and shooting, till seven antelope lay on the ground. Then the remainder seemed to locate us, and in an instant they were off across the prairie, far beyond the reach of bullets. Another way of hunting antelope (which I now look upon with disfavor,) was practiced by a friend of mine once—and only once. He came from Boston to visit me in my Western home and was very anxious to shoot an antelope as he wanted the head to take back to Massachusetts. One day he rushed in saying there was a big buck feeding alone about half a mile from the house. I gave him my Winchester, and filling the magazine," he hurried away on foot. He had never shot anything in the way of game, and as he was too excited to even hit a barn, I paid no attention to him. Soon after he left I started on horseback down the river bank to get a bunch of cattle. As I was riding along a bullet whistled by my head, and looking round I saw the antelope running straight toward me, followed by my friend yelling like a madman and shooting as he ran. "Zip!" and another ball was uncomfortably near. I jumped from my horse, who ran off a little way, and swung my arms and waved my hat to stop my friend shooting, but to no purpose. On came the buck in a bee line for me, and the bullets from the gun of the lunatic behind him were falling all around. I dropped to the ground, pulled grass out by the roots, in a vain endeavor to pull myself out of sight. To say I was scared is putting it mildly. My hair, which was long and fell over my shoulders, now stood straight up, making me look like a native Circassian. The antelope passed by me a few feet away, a few more bullets buried themselves near me, throwing the dust all around. In a few moments my friend stood beside me, ammunition gone, breathless, and gasped, "Did you see him? I most got him." I got up, took his gun, spoke a few lines of curse words to him in a gentle voice, and told him to go to the house. He went. It was a month before he mentioned "antelope hunting" again.



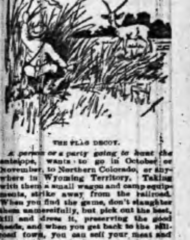
SNEAKING UP TO THE GAME.



A PRETTY SHOT.

Another method of getting a good shot at this game is to get on the edge of a hill, or in tall grass, near a bunch, close up to the leeward, and then tie a red or white handkerchief to a ramrod or stick. The antelope is full of curiosity, and once he catches sight of your flag, he will try to discover what it is. He gives a little snort and cautiously steps towards it, you keeping still the while. Then you gently wave your flag to and fro, letting it drop out of sight for a moment, then showing it again. The antelope will draw near, then run off a few yards, give a "whistle" of mingled surprise and fear, and then come up again, each time coming closer than before. Now he is pretty close, only a few yards off and standing "side on." You have placed your flag staff in the ground and have your rifle ready. Aim just back of the shoulder and a little above the body line. First with a spring in the air he drops and you run up to find him in his last gasp, shot through the heart.

The head of a buck antelope well-mounted, makes a trophy any hunter will prize, and before many years it will be very hard to procure one. The antelope used to roam in large numbers on the Laramie Plains, Wyoming, and in the North and Middle Parks in Colorado. They are to be found there yet, but the bunches are small. I was on a hunt a few years ago in the "Medicine Bow" range, and one day we ran across a large band of over a thousand, coming down Big Creek from North Park on their way out to the plains for the winter. There were some meat hunters at hand, and they just aimed at the mass, which were going through a narrow canon, and shot down quantities of them. It is such butcheries as this that have thinned out the game in the West. Should it be allowed to continue, antelope will in a few years be as scarce as Buffalo.



THE FLAG DECOY.

A person or a party going to hunt the antelope, wants to go in October or November, to Northern Colorado, or anywhere in Wyoming Territory. Taking with them a small wagon and camp equipments, strike away from the railroad. When you find the game, don't slaughter them unmercifully, but pick out the best, kill and dress it, preserving the good heads, and when you get back to the railroad town, you can sell your meat and what hides you don't want to take home and the proceeds will pay a good part of the expenses. To an Eastern man I would say, go on an antelope hunt by all means, camp out, sleep in the open air, it won't hurt you, have a good time, kill some game, bring home some heads for your library, or office wall. Then every time you look at them you will think of the good time you had and wish yourself back on the open prairie chasing the fleet-footed game. But, don't get "rattled" and pepper your best friends.

R. L. FARNAM.

AN OLD RIVER SPORT.

George Devol, a Once Famous Gambler on Western Steamboats.

A representative of a generation fast dying out was in Memphis the other day. It is a generation of men that flourished and decayed with the steamboat interest on the southwestern rivers, and though not commendable from the moralist's point of view they were an interesting part of life from Cincinnati to New Orleans a score or two years ago. The visitor, says the Memphis Avalanche, was a man of sixty, well preserved and stoutly built, with hairy, muscular hands; a big head, from which time is plucking the strands of sandy hair, a short beard of the same color tinged with gray, and gray eyes, with the quick, keen glance peculiar to men who have carried their lives in their hands and who search in that swift moment the features of people they meet for the first time. It was George Devol, an Ishmaelite of the Ishmaelites, for forty years the king of the river gamblers, who in his eventful career has seen more of the seamy side of existence on and along the Mississippi than any other living man, and whose name is as familiar as pig tracks to people who have traveled on the great river before and since the war.

"Every body gambled," he said, as he sat in the office, "and all had stuff to lose. I handled every sort of tools them days—monte, faro, roulette, short cards and every thing you wanted to bet on. I had the 'privilege' of all the big boats runnin' out of Orleans, and it wasn't much of a week when I didn't draw out five or ten thousand. Now I'm glad to get a hundred sellin' a book. It was the monte that used to slay the most lambs, though. It was so simple, you see, and they all just knew they could beat it. It caught the fellers with the big wallets that thought they could bust any little machine like that. Did they ever bust it? Well, not as I remember. It wasn't built that way. Yes, I've been a pretty hard one.

"One thing I can say that lots of men that think they are better than me can't. I never beat a friend, or anybody that I knew and liked. I never would give up money that I won when there was a bluff made, but many's the thousand dollars I've given back to men that couldn't afford to lose it, and many's the time I've given back diamonds and such to ladies on boats when their husbands would lose 'em to me. Fights? Well, rather.

"I've been cut and slashed and shot all over, but I'm here yet, you see. Look at that gash on my throat; see that wrist shot all to flinders; and there's plenty more signs where you can't see 'em. My main holt in a rough and tumble fight was buttin'. I won most of my fights that way. I never wanted but one pass at a man and I had him. My head's as hard as iron. I'll bet money that I can split the skull of any nigger in America, and there's mighty few doors I can't bust in. Of course, I wouldn't be here if the steamboat men hadn't been my friends. I stood in with the bar-keepers and mates and pilots, and the officers liked me and wouldn't see me hurt by a mob if they could help it. Still, I've had to take water more than once to save my bacon when there was a gang after me.

"There are just as many suckers on the big Atlantic liners as you can find anywhere on earth, and they are generally well fixed—tour of Europe and all that, you know. I've worked 'em many a time to the Queen's taste. The purser stood in with me. I'd go aboard and put my tools in his office and he would point out to me the passengers most likely to be worth my while. I always put a stock of good liquor, wines and cigars in my state-room and after I got acquainted I would invite the fellers in to sample 'em, and then I had the game in my own hands."

A Woman's Pocket.

Yellowly—Why, Brownly, how bad you look this morning. Did you sleep any last night?

Brownly—Not a wink.

Y.—Anybody sick?

B.—I am.

Y.—What's the matter?

B.—Well, you see my wife has been in the habit of going through my pockets at night, and I thought what was good for the gander was good for the goose, so after she fell asleep last night I arose and set out to go through her pockets.

Y.—Get anything?

B.—No. Searched the dress over and over, spent the whole night at it, but couldn't find the pocket.

Plenty of Exercise.

Friend—So you have another race booked. I haven't seen you taking the regulation exercise spins to get in condition, while I have met your opponent religiously preparing himself for the encounter.

Famous Sprinter—Oh! I take my exercise at night.

Friend—Where and how?

F. S.—At home. The baby gives me all the exercise I need, and more too.

Back From the Country.

Policeman—What, returned to the city so early in the season?

Tramp—Yes, boss, the city's good enough for me.

P.—Why so. I supposed the country was a paradise in summer, to those of your kind.

T.—So it was once, boss, but the farmers are now all takin' summer boarders and work off their cold vittles on 'em.

In the Cemetery.

Mr. Cynic—Ah! doctor, this is a solemn place to visit. Do you come here often.

Doctor Squills—No. I have never been here before.

Mr. Cynic—Indeed! Isn't that neglectful on your part, since so many of your patients are here?

Mrs. Brown—Why don't you say "Thank you," Johnnie, for that piece of cake?

Little Johnnie—'Cause you said you would lick me if you heard another word out of me the whole evening.

PURSUING PROTECTION.

The practical way to protect labor is to profitably and permanently enlarge the sphere of employment.

That is a common sense business proposition, and present existing facts in more than one prominent department of industry furnishes the proof positive, and furthermore, that was the direct end sought to be attained by the Democratic tariff measure passed at the last session of Congress, but thrust aside by a Republican Senate.

That important branch of trade and industry is in a deplorable condition. Mills are stopping or running at a loss, failures are numerous, and what should be a lucrative investment for both capital and labor is flat and unprofitable.

Why so?

Simply because under the false idea of protecting a comparatively small portion of required raw material, known as American wool, an enormous and unneeded duty is levied upon all grades of foreign, and consequently, the woolen manufacturers of the United States find it impossible to compete with those of England, where crude materials, of every kind, come to the manufacturer unhampered by oppressive taxation.

That is the reason why!

The use of woolen fabrics in a climate like this is almost universal, and in spite of the towering duties imposed and maintained by a war-taxation tariff, the importation of such goods into our country is largely on the increase.

There is no mystery about it.

We are engaged in the absurd work of protecting Englishmen, not Americans.

The English manufacturer is happy and thriving. He laughs at our folly and pockets our dollars. He has free wool and other free materials in abundance, and supplied with improved machinery the markets of the world are his to enjoy.

He is free to prosper.

We are protected to dwindle and fail.

Wages have little or nothing to do with the matter.

Grant the American manufacturer a similar just and sensible opportunity, give him cheapened raw materials, and the balance of account would very soon change in his favor, and, as a natural result, to the advantage of the wage-earner. With our skilled inventions, and the superior efficiency of American labor, we could not only supply home demand for manufactured articles, but with certainty share in the paying benefits of foreign markets, now closed against us by our own short-sighted policy.

Free wool could not in any manner injure the domestic product, but on the contrary benefit it, because the admixture of other wools would so vastly augment and keep steady the demand for all grades.

Tariff Reform is rapidly growing in popular approval, notably so throughout the New England States, and the day approaches when the American people will learn that political humbug is neither common sense, common honesty, nor business prosperity, and that ill-conditioned and industry-hindering tariff taxation is as far removed from genuine home protection as the poles are from the equator.

After the Delinquents.

Delinquent tax collector, Justice V. W. Nash, is making things uncomfortably warm for the delinquents. Already he has had paid in about $2,500 in back taxes, and he is now calling personally upon those who are in arrears with their taxes. On Thursday he visited over fifty persons, all of whom made satisfactory arrangements and promised to "come to centre." The justice has also levied upon one shoe store, a hotel, a fruit store and a private dwelling in the Second Ward.

Poker Playing.

Any pleasant afternoon a poker game can be seen in full operation under the shade trees which line Carlton avenue, just East of the Crescent ball ground. Boys ranging in age from fifteen to twenty-five years, spend their time there and gamble away their loose change. It is also stated that poker playing is a daily occurrence in a certain barn on Broadway, less than a mile from the Crescent Avenue church.

SUICIDE AT BOUND BROOK.

David Mack, an old and respected resident of Bound Brook, committed suicide by shooting himself in the mouth, at his home, corner of John and Franklin streets, Sunday afternoon. The dead man was found in an out house, about half-past one o'clock, soon after the deed was committed.

The deceased was about seventy years of age, and for many years he was a member of the Bloomington Saw Mill Company. A son of his, Mr. Richard Mack, is a conductor on the Lehigh Valley Railroad. No cause is assigned for the man's rash act.

Mr. Mack was an old "'49er," having gone West during the great gold excitement in that year, where he amassed considerable wealth.

County Physician, H. G. Wagoner, of Somerville was notified of the suicide, and gave the necessary burial permit, deeming an inquest unnecessary, and Undertaker Bush took charge of the remains.

The Season at the Hotel Netherwood, Its Best.

(From a Special Correspondent.)

The season at this charming Summer resort, dating from May up to the present writing, may be classed as the most brilliant and prosperous known in the annals of this Hotel. The genial and courteous proprietor, Mr. Frank E. Miller, with his able corps of assistants in every department, have left nothing undone, so far as your correspondent has been able to observe, to render his guests comfortable and happy.

The success of any first-class hotel largely—I may say, entirely—depends upon its management. The closest scrutiny in the thousand and one details incident to an establishment of this character, is required, hence the necessity for unceasing watchfulness on the part of its head. Therefore we may safely state that the present successful season is due to the fact that the requisites mentioned have been fully complied with.

The Chef who presides over the cuisine, has proved himself entirely competent for the important post assigned him. The able steward certainly deserves mention for his excellent provision for the guests. The head of the dining room, for many years with Delmonico, is unceasing in his efforts to please his patrons. Now we enter the office of the Hotel—a favorite resort of the guests—where we find Col. F. H. Whiting, Chief Clerk, presiding over this department, who possesses every requisite for this important position.

The Hotel will accommodate about 300 guests. The rooms are en suite and single, spacious and comfortable. In the way of recreation and amusement—billiard room, bowling alley, lawn tennis courts, croquet grounds, etc. An excellent orchestra provides music for the morning and evening.

The Hotel Netherwood's close proximity to New York, (45 minutes by express trains, with an average of thirty trains daily each way), renders it very desirable for business men, and equally attractive to others seeking a delightful and home-like hotel. Visitors coming here cannot fail to be impressed with the reign of good fellowship existing among the guests, a fact which gives me great pleasure to chronicle.

Progressive euchre, promenade and lotto parties have been noted events of the season, as well as the Saturday evening hops. The Fall season opens on Sept. 1, and promises to be one of the most brilliant and successful seasons, from the large booking, ever known here. Charming entertainments are booked for the Court Month at Netherwood. Your good readers should be advised that the Hotel remains open from May till November.

THATCHER'S INTENTIONS.

"Gentleman George," for so many years the head—and shoulders too—of that far-famed minstrel triumvirate, Thatcher, Primrose and West, is home again in his handsome house on West Seventh street, as jovial and genial as ever, but looking even younger and heartier.

Interlocutor West and Tambourine Primrose, have long since given to the newspapers their story of the recent dissolution of the trio in San Francisco, and their future plans, yet until now Bones Thatcher has never violently unbosomed his feelings and intentions. But he expressed himself, on Monday, as glad of a chance to tell his friends through The Press, what he proposed doing.

Everybody who knows George Thatcher can understand how deeply his good nature is touched, and his faith in mankind is shocked, by the action of his partners conspiring together to dissolve the firm for the purpose of freezing him out. Anyone in the profession knows that George Thatcher lifted up Primrose and West, set them on high, and made a fortune for each of them. Now they break the partnership because they think they can walk alone and because, as they say, Thatcher spends his money too liberally in social pleasures with the firm's friends and the firm's patrons. All of which only proves that they have the big head and he has the big heart. They rush into print with a story of Thatcher's social life that is no disgrace, yet if he should retaliate in the same way with some of their social lives, their [illegible] appear in a court of divorce might follow.

"I am not going with Dockstader or anyone else, as has been rumored," said Thatcher. "Some of the best managers in the country have made me most generous offers, and unlimited capital is at my command with which to organize and maintain 'George Thatcher's Minstrels,' the company I shall probably take upon the road this Fall. It is late for booking, but I am assured by theatre owners in all the best cities, that I shall have time arranged for with them.

"I have earned the right and the means to take a long rest at home, yet I am anxious to get out with my own company and give the people the best minstrel show ever organized. I can give a better one than any of my competitors, because I have the experience and, besides, now that I am alone and need not divide the profits in three shares, I can afford to give these times as many as [illegible]. Should I decide to form 'George Thatcher's Minstrels' and start out this Fall, I shall open in Plainfield and trust to the good judgment of the people for the show's complete [illegible], and to their good wishes for its future prosperity."

A Serious Runaway.

A horse attached to a light no-top business wagon, driven by Mr. Fred Harris of Clinton avenue, ran away on Peace street at ten o'clock Monday. When turning into Front street Mr. Harris was thrown out and sustained a severe fracture to his right leg at the ankle. The wounded man was carried into Dr. Probasco's office, where the wounds were dressed, and later he was taken to his home.

Information for Those Who Kick at Their Poll Taxes.

How strange it is that men of principle will live in and enjoy the benefits of a free country, and yet kick because they are asked to pay a dollar a year for the privilege of being a "citizen."

The following is but one of many like letters received by The Press within the past few weeks:

To the Editor of The Daily Press: Our delinquent tax collector seems to have frightened many of our poor working men with his printed notice, "pay or go to jail." For the benefit of those who have not read the law, would you be kind enough to publish the law or act upon which he bases his authority for such, and oblige. A SUBSCRIBER.

Plainfield, Aug. 15, 1889.

The Corporation Counsel has furnished the following laws in relation to the matter, now in force:

From Revision, Title, General Tax Law, Section 18:

"And the said warrant shall further direct that if goods and chattels of the delinquent cannot be found, or not sufficient to make the money required, the constable shall take his or her body if to be found in the county, and deliver the same to the Sheriff of such county or his jailor, to be kept in close and safe custody until payment be made of the tax with costs."

Above was amended in 1879 (P. L. p. 237) so as to take away the power to arrest and imprison in cases of non-payment of taxes assessed on real estate. As to all other taxes, the above cited law from the Rev. is in full force.

The law of 1879 is as follows:

CHAPTER CXLVII.

WHEREAS, It has been held by the court of errors and appeals that taxes duly assessed for and on account of real property are not necessarily first liens thereon, but are to be deferred to mortgages which have been made upon such property previously to the assessment of such taxes thereon; and whereas, the equity of redemption or legal title to real property is to a very large extent is vested in persons who, by reason of the depreciation in value of such property, or other misfortunes, are unable to pay the taxes thereon; and whereas, constables and other officers charged with the collection of taxes, finding it impossible to collect the same from owners who cannot pay, and from mortgagees who will not pay, may obtain warrants for the imprisonment of the bodies of such owners so delinquent, under and by virtue of section eighteen of an act concerning taxes [Revision of Statutes of New Jersey, page 1142], to the great hardship, suffering and disgrace of such owners and their families, and to the discredit of this State; therefore,

1. BE IT ENACTED BY THE SENATE AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY, That hereafter no warrant shall be issued by any justice of the peace or other officer of this State, to any constable or other officer directing or authorizing the arrest or imprisonment of any person for or on account of any default or delinquency in the payment of taxes on real estate; but nothing in this act shall be construed to affect or in any wise to abridge or impair any provision other than arrest and imprisonment, for the collection of taxes.

2. AND BE IT ENACTED, That this act shall take effect immediately.

Approved March 14, 1879.

Mr. [illegible]'s Aesthetic Signature That Baffles Even Experts.

(From the N. Y. Herald.)

New Jersey is a wonderful State. Another of her phenomenal features entirely unconnected with mosquitoes or red mud has recently come to light, and paralyzed the rest of the world by its incomprehensibility. It is the alleged signature of a man, but it looks more like a fancy sketch of a flash of lightning on a highly original "bear" or the vagaries of a vagabond spider inebriated with ink.

The individual who has earned this new fame for Jersey writes a legible, business-like hand until he reaches the spot where his signature should be affixed. Then, as he solemnly asserts, a kind of nervous spasm attacks his fingers, he loses control over his hand, which gives a convulsive wriggle and twitch, and then follows a result.

There is fame awaiting the man who can unaided decipher the signature, but if anyone attempts to gain it he will surely die. A wholesale vendor of puzzles made a bid for the exclusive use of that signature the other day, but that was on hearsay only. When he saw the scrawl in all its intricacy he admitted that even he dare not risk execration and an early grave by springing it on an unsuspecting and inquisitive public.

A BANK CASHIER TOO.

One would naturally suppose that the writer of such a signature would prefer to keep it at storage during the Summer months, or would plead rheumatism or ignorance and choose a plain "X his mark" in preference to indulging the unholy spasm that has such a result, but on the contrary he lets it loose broadcast upon the world from the official desk of a bank cashier. Worse still, he has been doing it for about twenty-seven years. It is a hard matter to pass a bank bill bearing that signature outside of the town in which its owner lives. There he is well known and the natives not only venerate him for his originality but proudly boast to strangers their ability to read the hieroglyphics which puzzle all but the initiated.

It is said that a notorious bunco steerer who was rusticating in that section of Jersey determined to earn a safe livelihood in future by betting with strangers on the meaning of the scrawl and then obtaining the unimpeachable testimony of the bank cashier himself as to his veracity and the true interpretation of the signature. It was necessary to go farther afield in order to entrap unwary ones, however; the confidence man had omitted to write down the cashier's name, and after he had made a bet on the signature he failed to remember it and was caught in his own trap.

A business man of the city, had an unpleasant experience with a bundle of nice, new, crisp five dollar bills, which constituted all the cash he had with him on a trip to Western New York. Each bill bore the delirious sign manual and this, combined with the suspiciously new appearance of the paper, made everyone fight shy of them and cast obloquy upon him as a would-be "shover of the queer."

SARCASM LAUNCHED AT HIM.

The unhappy cashier is often the recipient of sarcastic inquiries from distant correspondents. The cashier of a Western bank, for instance, wrote to know whether the fly that was acting as his amanuensis was suffering from sickness when it crawled over a bank note received by him. Strange as it may seem, however, the entire first name of the cashier is spelled out in the long line preceded by the curve in the first part of the signature, and as many strokes of the pen are made as would be used if it were written more legibly, while an abnormally active imagination might expand the entire scrawl into [illegible], who is over 50 years of age and for over a quarter of a century has been the cashier of the First National Bank of Plainfield, N. J.

Wants to Do Like Plainfield.

The Elizabeth Herald says: "What has been done for Plainfield by cheap homes for the workingmen can be done in Elizabeth, and the only wonder to us is that, having so many wealthy land-owners among us, that none have thus far seen sufficiently into the future as to invest in what we feel assured will in the immediate present be a very profitable investment."

A Mad Dog in the Borough.

Some time during the month of May, Mr. Mark Loos, of Chatham street, took a hound dog to board from Mr. [illegible], of Washington Park. For some four or five weeks past the dog has from time to time been troubled with fits, and also refused his food.

Tuesday he had a more severe attack, having three fits, frothing at the mouth, and breaking his chain twice, showing every symptom of hydrophobia. It was thought absolutely necessary by all who saw him that he should be shot, which mission was performed by ex-Marshal Becker.

THE CRESCENTS FLYING HIGH.

The Crescent nine having won thirteen games and lost but three, this season, its management feels so proud that it can't keep itself on the earth and is beginning to soar high. It has had the audacity to schedule a game with the mighty Winthrops of New York, for next Saturday, and also one with the Hackett-Carhart nine for Labor Day morning, Sep. 2. If the Crescents get a half-dozen runs in both games, they may be proud.

Among the clubs the Winthrops have beaten this year, are such strong nines as the New Jersey Athletic Club, Clintons, of New York and Brooklyn Athletics. Their battery is the celebrated Currie brothers whom the N. J. A. C., borrowed when they recently massacred the Rahway Club.

But the Crescent nine will be strengthened in every way, and, consequently, even if the home team is beaten, exciting games should result. The management is right. The people would rather see the playing of the best teams, even if the Crescents are oftener beaten, than a one-sided picnic for the home nine.

It is rumored that hereafter Condon will play on first as The Press has suggested. Bowman, second, Lee, third, and Cadmus, short, will complete the strongest infield possible. Gately will pitch, and the best man possible to obtain will be signed to catch when Bowes is not behind the bat.

CITY COUNCIL MEETING.

The City Council met in adjourned regular session, Tuesday, ostensibly to examine the Assessor's tax duplicate for 1889. President Dumont called the meeting to order at 8:25 o'clock, and besides himself there were present Messrs. Dunham, Erickson, Jenkins, Moffett and Newball.

The reading of the minutes of the previous meeting was dispensed with and the regular order of business suspended. Council then proceeded to examine the Assessor's duplicate.

Upon re-assembling at 8:55 o'clock, Mr. Erickson offered a resolution, which prevailed, to the effect that the Assessor's duplicate as examined by the Council be adopted.

He also recommended that the per centage as fixed by the Assessor ($2.15 on the $100) be approved, and it was so ordered. Last year the rate was $2.18 on the $100. The following figures will show the total valuation, together with the per centage and the various amounts to be raised by taxation for the present year:

Total assessed valuation $5,[illegible]

	Rate		Raises
County	22	"	[illegible]
State school	20	"	[illegible]
Library	4½	"	[illegible]

Fire	22	"	[illegible]
School	40	"	[illegible]
Bonds	14	"	[illegible]
Total	$2.15		$[illegible]

According to the above rates the school tax has been decreased ten cents on the $100, and the city tax has been increased to the extent of five cents. The increased valuation in real estate is about $49,000 over last year.

A petition was received from Mr. A. F. Venino asking permission to erect a dwelling house at the South corner of Madison avenue and Sixth street, said building to be one story of brick and the remainder of wood with slate roof. Referred to the Committee on Fire and Buildings with power; as was also a petition from Mr. E. C. Mulford for permission to remove a one-story frame building from No. 41 to No. 65 North avenue.

Council then adjourned.

CHILDREN'S FESTIVAL.

The third annual children's festival of the Plainfield Gesang and Turn Verein took place at Keller's Grove, on Sunday, and was largely attended. Between fifty and sixty of the members, together with their families, from the Aurora Singing Society of New Brunswick, were present, and in all about 150 children were entertained in various ways. They were also abundantly supplied with sandwiches, iced cream, lemonade and candy.

In beginning the festivities all of the children were arranged in a circle on the platform, and Mr. Hugo Weigmann, the President of the Plainfield Society, addressed them thus: "Children! Last year I promised you, that, if you all would be good children, behave well, obey your parents, be ambitious at school, another festival would be tendered to you in the course of a year, and as your parents have told me that you all have behaved well with the exception of a few boys, we have to-day arranged another picnic for you and we will give you a better one still next year, if you do the same as you have done the past year."

The children then marched around the platform, and in passing an improvised fish pond, each one fished out, with hook and line, a handsome present.

One of the features was the turning by the pupils of the Turning school, in command of Turnwart Fred Becker, on the horizontal bar. Six prizes were awarded for high and long distance jumping as follows:

High jumping—First, Frank Keller; second, George Hansen; third, Philip Friese.

Long distance—First, Werner Pearson; second, Louis Bimbel, third, George Bremer.

Another feature of the festival was the sack-racing and "pot" breaking by the boys, and the egg-racing by the girls. In the former event Frank Keller, Harry Deakins, W. Pearson and Theo. Kroeg-feld got prizes, and in the latter handsome prizes were awarded to Katie Sutterlin, Henriette Mann, Ida Weigmann, Elfie Blatz, Lizzie Walton, Allie Grieb, Meda Krose, Mamie Drewelt, Lizzie Deakins, Frieda Gaub.

At about 7 o'clock the visitors started for home with many thanks to the Singers for the glorious day they had arranged for them. Soon after the members with their children also left for home every one satisfied with the day's enjoyment.

A Prize for the Crescents.

Mr. Frank P. Huff, the merchant tailor, has offered as a prize a handsome pair of custom-made pantaloons to any member of the Crescent ball nine who steals the most bases between now and the close of the season.

Can't Even Copy News Straight.

The News is copying from The Press of the day before its account of the Rev. Mr. Dwight's purchase of a home in the Borough, erroneously added that "he has taken up his residence" therein already.

Wedding Bells.

At St. Mary's church at 5:30 o'clock on Aug. 14, was consummated the marriage of Miss Bridget McFadden of this city and Mr. James McCarthy of New York, Rev. Father Smyth officiating. After the ceremony a reception was held at the residence of the bride's parents on West 4th street, at which the newly-wedded couple received the congratulations of their friends and acquaintances. The gifts were numerous and costly.

Lockjaw Resulted From a Cold in a Torn Finger.

Mr. Jesse Dayton, a popular young man residing near New Market, died on Aug. 14, of lockjaw. He leaves a wife and two children.

The indirect cause of his death happened about two weeks ago, when playing ball he unfortunately had one of his finger nails torn off. The wound was properly treated at the time, but at Boynton Beach, Wednesday, August 7, he caught cold in the finger, while bathing. Saturday Dayton was at the races at the Park Avenue Driving Park. He there complained to his physician, Dr. Nelson, that he felt very bad effects from the sore finger. The Doctor advised him what to do, and promised to call on him the next day. This he subsequently did on Sunday, and discovered the terrible symptoms of lockjaw.

Dr. Endicott, of this city, was called in, but the consultation was of no avail. The unfortunate victim could not be saved.

Dayton was about thirty years of age and much admired among a host of friends in this city and about his home. He was the son of one of the oldest residents in Piscataway township.

Sounds Just Like Westfield.

"Dr. Ripley" a resident of our quaint and rather ancient sister village, Westfield—ancient so far as its street lights are concerned—has this to say in the Standard, on Saturday, concerning the New Jersey Central Railroad and its management:

"As a great trunk-road, as a first-class road in every respect we believe the grand conception of a grand railroad president, John Taylor Johnston, of Plainfield, for twenty-five years president of the company, will soon be fully realized. Mr. J. Rogers Maxwell, now the president of the Central railroad system, (himself a man of rare genius and executive ability,) has, unquestionably, gathered much fruit shaken from the tree by his predecessor, Mr. Johnston, so long at the head of that company. Mr. Maxwell has dug wide and deep in rich soil, re-establishing the fortunes of his present trust, making the Central a trunk-road. * * * The future of the Central railroad company of New Jersey, and so the future of Central New Jersey itself, and not least, its favored and favorite spot, Westfield, are assured. Westfield has entered the race as a first-class competitor for first place on the line of that popular railroad. It is going to win, too."

What's the matter with Plainfield, with its many miles of macadamized roads, its public school facilities, something Westfield lacks, its street lighting, another thing the place needs and must have, before sane people will locate there. And last but not least, Westfield must abolish the liquor traffic, like Plainfield, before it can expect to grow much. At the present time Westfield is in the [illegible].

A CHASE AFTER A TRAMP.

The Press has frequently called attention to the large number of tramps who rendezvous in the vicinity of Grant avenue and Evona, and who go from house to house in the day time begging food, clothing, money, tobacco, etc., from females who are alone at the time. Despite the vigilance of the police, these fellows continue their depredations, and the nuisance is increasing to such an alarming extent, that it is unsafe for women to be left in the house alone.

One of the fraternity of tramps, however, ran up against a snag Monday, in the person of Officer Kriney, who jailed him and next morning Justice Nash committed the fellow to the county jail to await the action of the Grand Jury in default of $500 bail, on a charge of having stolen property in his possession.

It appears that the man, who gave his name as Peter Gramee, and a companion known as "Johnny Barnes" were seen loitering around Mrs. Carrie Heffney's residence on West Front street, Monday afternoon, and one of them entered the cellar through an open window and stole a pair of shoes belonging to Mrs. Heffney's husband. Officer Kriney was notified of the theft, and he chased the tramps. One of them escaped, but the other was caught in a corn field in North Plainfield and overpowered after a desperate struggle.

The fellow was locked up and next morning Mrs. Heffney preferred a charge against him. Officer Kriney also entered a complaint against the prisoner for assault and battery, and on this charge he was held in the sum of $100.

THE SAD CASE OF MRS. FLIEGE.

(From the Central Times.)

The readers of the Times have been informed somewhat of the case of the ill-treated German lady, Mrs. Liena Fliege, who arrived at our railway station, sick and sad, a total stranger, four weeks ago. During the past week an American lady who could converse with her in her own language, felt impelled to make her acquaintance and found her to be a well bred and thoroughly educated person, and withal, a devout christian whose religious faith and philosophy have alone sustained her in the dark hours through which she has been, and is still, passing.

It was natural, perhaps, for the depot attendants and police officers who first met her in her desolate condition upon her arrival here to suppose that her mind was unsound, but that proves to have been an entirely erroneous view of the matter. Her mind has been perfectly sound through all her terrible experiences, and her suffering has been all the more keenly felt in consequence.

The lady is 55 years of age, and has been engaged in teaching in private schools in Germany for thirty years. She gave up her position at the earnest solicitation of a brother in St. Louis, from whom she had been separated since a child, who desired her to make her home with him the rest of her life. She reached his home last November, but it was anything but a home to her, but more of this anon. As a final act in his brutal course, he bustled his sister into a train for New York, without making the slightest provision for her comfort and safety.

She is here penniless and wishes to return to Germany as soon as possible. Chief Carey has kindly busied himself to raise some funds to aid her. He needs more than he has received. Let all humane persons contribute to help a worthy woman whose burden of sorrow is almost greater than she can bear.

A Tour on Two Wheels.

Captain F. L. C. Martin, of the Plainfield Bicycle Club, left this city, Saturday on a cycling tour through Scotch Plains, New Providence, Morristown, Morris Plains, Dover, Succasunny, Lake Hopatcong, Sparta, Newton, Stillwater, Blairstown, and Columbia, N. J., Portland, Pa., Delaware Water Gap, Stroudsburg, Bushkill, Dingman's Ferry and Milford, to Port Jervis, N. Y. The trip will cover about 350 miles. Captain Martin will be gone two weeks.

The Rev. Goyn Talmage.

The announcement that the above-named divine would preach at the Trinity Reformed church, Sunday morning and evening, drew forth a large audience at each service.

His morning theme was the story of the "Samaritan woman at the well," as related in the fourth chapter of the gospel of St. John. The story was told in a lucid, practical way, as only a Talmage could tell it, and the learned divine commanded the undivided attention of those present. His delivery is of a subdued, yet earnest style, and his argument remarkable for its convincing simplicity.

In the evening his text was "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches," as found in the 22d chapter of Proverbs. Many and pointed were the truths he drew from the text, and the originality used in putting them, left a lasting impression on his hearers.

EPISCOPAL STATISTICS.

The journal of the 105th annual convention of the Episcopal church in the diocese of New Jersey has just come to hand in a pamphlet of 188 pages. Besides the report of the proceedings of the last convention, the document contains many statistics that are of interest to religious circles, irrespective of denominational lines. The diocese includes all that part of New Jersey lying South of the counties of Essex, Morris and Warren.

There are in the diocese 129 churches, including missions and chapels. The communicants number 11,840, of whom, 1,420 were added to the church the last year. The number of Episcopal families is 7,132. There are 11,116 Sunday School pupils, and 1,294 Sunday school teachers.

The total receipts from pew rents, offerings, donations, etc., during the year were $212,349.77. Of this amount $4,825.02 were given for domestic missions, $2,967.70 for foreign missions, $8,195.37 for missions in the diocese, $703.78 for missions to colored people, $382.14 for Indian missions.

The Episcopal churches and missions of Plainfield make very interesting reports, from which is gleaned the following:

The Terrible Death of Clarence Pell Formerly of This City.

Clarence Guest Pell, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Walter P. Pell, formerly of this city, was shot and instantly killed by his friend, Ellis H. Roberts, Thursday last, while they were hunting in the Adirondack woods.

The unfortunate victim of the accident is well-known in this city, where he lived many years. His parents then occupied a house they still own on East Third street. Clarence attended Mr. Leal's school here, and after being graduated went to Yale. He was a member of the Park Avenue Baptist church.

He was a law student at the college, and President of the Yale Football team. His father received a letter from his son the day before, telling him that he was enjoying his vacation and that he expected to leave for a hunting expedition after deer on the 15th. He would have been twenty-one years old next month, and was about to begin his second year's course at Yale.

The terrible accident occurred in this way: Pell and two companions, Cox and Husted, were camped near the river with their guide, Wm. Pell, an old woodsman. At 5 o'clock in the morning, when the mist was just rising from the woods and the sun was just beginning to creep up they made their way towards the deer lick. By a fatal coincidence Roberts and a companion named Sherman, who had their camp about a half mile above Lake Pansalla, had chosen the same lick. They arrived there about ten minutes in advance of the other party, and with rifles ready quietly waited for the coming of the game.

In the woody shadows the light was indistinct, and objects were not clearly discernible at a great distance. It was Roberts' first experience of the kind, and perhaps he was a little excited and eager to secure the first shot. He did not have to wait long. Suddenly, in the opposite direction, was heard the cautious breaking of twigs and the unmistakable moving of shrubbery. Then the sounds ceased.

The two hunters were ready with their weapons with their attention centred in the direction from which the sound came. A movement on their own part had evidently warned the game. The sounds began again and the young men were on the qui vive. Suddenly, about ten rods away, Roberts saw a tan colored object, evidently the back of an animal. Quickly as his excitement would permit, his rifle was brought up to his shoulder. He took a quick sight and fired. The object dropped.

With a shout of exultation Roberts rushed forward, followed by Sherman and their guide Spinner. The intervening distance was quickly covered, and instead of a deer laid low by a bullet, they saw Pell lying in the arms of his guide, the blood gushing from a wound in his right side. He wore a tan-colored coat. When Roberts realized what he had done he was overcome with grief. Pell made a cry when he was struck, but never spoke afterwards. He died in a short time.

It was a sad party that returned to the little camp. The two young men were good friends. Owing to the distance from any telegraph or telephone station, the news had to be carried miles through the wild country by Pell's companion. The young man who unwittingly caused Mr. Pell's death is a grandnephew of Assistant United States Treasurer Ellis H. Roberts of New York. He is only 16 years old.

—Oh, for a Y. M. C. A. building.

—"E, there," says the [illegible] to the clam, "we will soon be in the soup."

—The Quarterly Meeting of the Society of Friends was held in meeting house at Third and Peace streets, Thursday.

—The first katydid appeared here about July 20, and if the old prediction is true, we will have frost about Sept. 1.

—There is said to be a dangerous wash-out on Mountain avenue, between Raymond and Leland avenues, which the township authorities should attend to at once.

—The members of the Middlesex Gun Club are making extra arrangements this season for their annual shooting tournament, which will be held at Dunellen on Oct. 8, 9, 10 and 11.

—It has been suggested that since the Crescents grounds have been enclosed, a series of athletic games may be made to pay there during the coming Fall. Who will start the ball a rolling?

—The Crescents of this city and the West Ends of Somerville will cross bats again on the home grounds on Saturday, August 31, and on the following Saturday the Crescents will play at Somerville.

—Since the recent flood several springs have broken through the concrete flooring in the boiler room of THE PRESS office and water has flowed in the room to such a depth as to put out the fire in the furnace.

—Miss Rocap's school for boys will open at the corner of Central avenue and Fourth street, Thursday, Sept. 19. Miss Rocap, whose reputation as a kind and efficient tutor is unexcelled, will be assisted by Miss Ida Rocap.

—There is a dangerous hole in the roadway at Grove street and Craig place, which the Borough Street Commissioner should have repaired at once before North Plainfield is held liable for damages resulting therefrom.

—All of the shade trees about Mr. F. X. Schoonmaker's residence on Putnam avenue, have been trimmed of their lower branches to a height of about fifteen feet from the ground, thereby adding beauty to the surroundings.

—Although Mr. John H. Tier beat the city in his Sunday selling [illegible], he has decided not to keep his ice cream garden open on Sunday, and [illegible] he can make enough money during the week days, to enable him to [illegible] up on the Sabbath.

—Will the overseers of the roads please improve the general appearance of the highways within their respective districts by cutting down and removing the weeds which grow so luxuriantly on the side of the roads. A little labor now will save in the future.

—The usual Saturday afternoon trial contests of speed, took place on the track of the Gentlemen's Driving Park Association on Saturday. The track was rather heavy, but in spite of this fairly good time was made by the local horses. The attendance was large.

—A gentleman from this city hired a horse from a horse dealer, Monday to drive over to Metuchen. The animal was all right going over, but coming back the stubborn beast refused to draw even a [illegible] wagon, and the man was obliged to lead the horse all the way home.

—The young Plainfield dude who had to bury his Sunday clothes, Sunday night last, won't poke at a "kitten" with his cane again. It all happened on Front street about nine o'clock, and the neighbors for blocks around were aware of the circumstances, although nobody said a word.

—Mr. J. R. Carey, of Jersey City, expects to complete the stone work on the new addition to the Crescent Avenue church, in about two weeks. The stone used is from the Martinsville quarry, and it is carted here on wagons. The stone used in the construction of the church proper, came from Nova Scotia.

—One of a crowd of overgrown boys who were passing along Somerset street, in the vicinity of the [illegible] at six o'clock Sunday, picked up a signal lamp and reflector which had been placed to warn pedestrians and drivers of a dangerous washout in the roadbed and threw them down among the rocks, shattering the glass into fragments. The boys will be arrested and made to answer.

Lost Both Legs.

Michael Gallagher, aged 25 years, a brakeman in the employ of the Central railroad, was the victim of an accident night of Aug. 14, while engaged at his duties at Bergen Point.

Gallagher was riding on the front of the locomotive as it was running on a coal siding. It had been raining, the step was slippery, and it is supposed Gallagher slipped off. He fell on the track and the train passed over him, mangling both legs at the ankle. The injured man was taken to the Elizabeth Hospital.

That Demented Woman.

Editor William J. Leonard has interested himself in the case of Lena Fliege, the demented woman, to whom reference is made in another column, and has removed her to his home on West Front street, where she will be cared for until sufficient funds are collected to send the unfortunate woman back to Germany. Chief Carey who has had charge of the case, "succeeded by collecting $76. Of this amount the Chief has paid out $18 for the woman's board, $10 to Mrs. Lynch for caring for the demented woman while she was confined in the lockup, and $10 to Mrs. [illegible] for sitting up with Mrs. Fliege at night.

The balance of the money Chief Carey had turned over to Mr. Leonard. About $110 is needed for the woman's passage to Germany.

Committed for Highway Robbery.

Abner Randolph, a colored youth, was arraigned before Justice Nash at the station house on Tuesday, charged with highway robbery. The complainant was Mr. William Cooney, who charged in his complaint that on Saturday night Randolph knocked him down with something resembling a sand bag and stole his watch while he was unconscious on the ground.

The prisoner demanded an examination, and from the testimony given by the plaintiff and William [illegible], a colored boy who was with Randolph when the alleged robbery took place, Justice Nash decided to hold the prisoner in the sum of $500 bonds to await the action of the Grand Jury. Constable Kiefer took the prisoner to Elizabeth in the afternoon. Manning furnished [illegible] bail to appear when wanted.

Robbed of Their Sleep.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—I would like to call the attention of the police, through the columns of THE PRESS, to the disgraceful brawls and fights which are of nightly occurrence in the vicinity of the "Boulevard."

One of these fights occurred last night, about 12 o'clock, near the T. A. B. Hall on West Fourth street. A ring was formed by the friends and backers of the two contestants, and a regular slugging match took place. The encouraging cries for the fighters and foul oaths by the crowd in attendance made night hideous and awakened people from their slumber some distance from the scene.

Cannot this evil be remedied?

PEACEFUL CITIZEN.

Plainfield, Aug. 15, 1889.

Bowling Match.

A South Plainfield Milkman Likely to Come to Grief.

The audacious and persistent attempts of a South Plainfield milkman who, by the way, is a married man, to wrong a young girl who is at present keeping house for her brother-in-law in this city while the latter's wife is away on a visit, has at last come to the notice of THE PRESS, with the request that it thoroughly ventilate the matter. To save the man's family the humiliation of being brought into public notice, we withhold all the names of those concerned, until such time as they may be subpoenaed to appear in court.

The girl above referred to is also a resident of South Plainfield, and the story is told to the effect that about two weeks ago, while she was returning home from a grocery store in that place, the milkman grasped her and made insulting proposals, which she indignantly repulsed. A few days ago the girl came to this city, and on morning Aug. 13, the fellow called at the house where she was stopping and requested to be shown through the house, at the same time using disrespectful language.

The girl became frightened and left the house, and in a short time the man went away. Thursday morning he called again, and it is alleged he took hold of the girl again, which she resented, and escaped by running through the kitchen and out into the door yard. Being unable to accomplish his design, the man left, only to return in the afternoon, but this time he was refused admission to the house. On the two former occasions he walked into the house without even knocking.

As before stated the fellow has only escaped arrest and imprisonment on account of his family, but if he continues in his advances toward the girl, his arrest will shortly follow.

THE BUTTERMILKS CHURNED.

The Buttermilk ball nine of New York, fell an easy prey to the Crescents, Saturday, because of their own rank playing. The home team did not put up much of a game itself, but it was good enough to sour the Buttermilks.

The game opened with the visitors at the bat, and a poor throw to second and a passed ball, both by Cadmus, let a run in. It looked dubious then for Plainfield. Gately "said" he would have to let up on his catcher, and it seemed as if the Crescents would be snowed under.

But they batted as they never batted before. Gordon made four hits, and everybody else excepting Hayden and McLaughlin, got one or two. Meyers was so afraid to put the ball over the plate in the second inning, that he sent four to first on balls and forced in two runs. Bowman played a fine second.

The score was:

Nearly Lost His Life.

A boy about fourteen years of age, whose name we are unable to ascertain, came near being shot at the Crescent ball grounds, Friday afternoon. The lad was sitting on one of the benches, when a thrown ball struck him on the right side, discharging a revolver which he carried in his coat pocket. The boy turned pale, and soon left the ball field.

"Two Little Boys Drowned at Plainfield."

Under the above caption the New York Star today say:

> Michael and Johnny Murphy, sons of Daniel Murphy, who is employed at the Inclined Plane, at Plainfield, were sailing their boats on the Morris Canal Thursday when they fell into the canal and were drowned. The boys were 5 and 4 years old, respectively.

We are at a loss to know where the incline plane is located in this city, and besides the name of "Daniel Murphy" does not appear in the directory.

Mr. Rounder's Lucky Recovery From a Snake Bite.

A copperhead snake, one of the most poisonous reptiles of its kind, bit Rynehart Rounder on the back of his hand, Wednesday afternoon of last week.

Dr. Matthews was at once called to the unfortunate man's relief, and by his prompt attendance and the administering of a quart and a pint of whiskey to his patient, Rounder's life was saved. He is now rapidly recovering from the combined effects of the bite and the dose.

Rounder lives just back of Bound Brook where he farms the old camp grounds of the late General George Washington. He was at work in the field when attacked by the snake.

First in War, and Now First in Peace.

Very few of those Plainfielders who are favored with the acquaintance of Sam'l K. Schwenk, proprietor of the celebrated Holly Grove Farm, and who have noticed and been charmed with his unostentatious ways, modest bearing and genial good-fellowship, are aware of the grand record placed after his name on the Army Register of the United States.

A few official extracts are are follows:

"1st Lieut. 50th Penn. Vols., 1861. Captain, 1862. Brevet Lieut. Colonel, March 25, 1865, for constant gallantry before Petersburg, and in the assault on Fort Stedman. Brevet Colonel Vols., and Brevet Brigadier Gen'l Vols., July 24, 1865, for meritorious service during the war. Brevet Captain, March 2, 1867, for gallant and meritorious service in the battle of Spottsylvania, Va. Brevet Major, March 2, 1867, for gallant and meritorious service in the Battle of Ny River, Va. Brevet Lieut. Colonel, March 2, 1867, for gallant and meritorious service in the Battle of Cold Harbor, Va. Retired, May 17, 1867."

Col. Schwenk has now settled quietly down with his family on one of the loveliest farms in the State, and is giving his entire attention to the World-famed herd of registered Jersey cattle that stock the place. The spirit that placed him first in war, has now incited his ambition to be often first in the peaceful profession of a gentleman dairyman. Butter from his cows has won the gold medals in all competitions of note wherever it has been entered.

The Holly Grove dairy and farm is a treat to visit. The most celebrated buttermakers oversee the manipulation of its products, and every appurtenance and process is gilt-edged and of the most approved modern means. The herd are fed on only the best of wholesome food, and no brewer's grains are used. It is indeed a model place in every way.

For THE CONSTITUTIONALIST.

JOHNSTOWN.

BY MRS. M. A. [illegible]

Fancied security was on each hand,
No thoughts of harm, or death, or woe:
The idle gossip rolled like dainty thing
Upon the wagging tongue. The careless,
Standing on the brink of death, as usual
Gave no heed to that great, far beyond,
Whence all are traveling.
The haughty belle as she passed down the street,
Gathered her silken skirts about her,
As she passed by some poor dressed plebian,
Little dreaming that so soon her body,
Powerless, a sickly, slimy, mud-bedabbled mass,
Should with the dirt and filth be piled,
Among the rubbish with the ones she thought so much beneath her.
Death thou art a leveler:
Filled with foolish pride; puffed up
With wealth; forgetting poor and rich,
Learned and unlearned, came from one parent source;
We toss our heads and look with sneers,
At those we judge so far beneath us;
And yet the time shall come when all
Shall leave this earth poor as the poorest,
Save in the jewelled soul made rich
By Christian deeds and charitable acts.

The Same Old Scaffold.

The scaffold on which two of the five murderers now awaiting execution in New York, are to be hanged, is the same one on which Bridget Durgan, who murdered Mrs. Coriell at New Market, was put to death at New Brunswick many years ago.

Perhaps the Committee Can Answer.

Mr. Thomas McGann, a resident of North Plainfield, and for the past twenty years a contractor by trade, requests us to ask why he was not awarded the contract by the North Plainfield Township Committee on Monday, for the rebuilding of the wall and filling in the washout near Demler's Hotel in the Notch.

Mr. McGann says his bid was $1,259, yet the contract was awarded to Mr. Joseph Ballery of this city, for $1,473. He also says he can find the best of bonds to complete the work.

Mr. Edward Benedict Daly, one of the news' compositors, has now been persuaded to accept the vacancy.

A Great Discovery.

The fact that castor-oil, as vile a medicine as was ever discovered, has so long held its own as a laxative, is because, until HAMBURG FIGS were discovered, no medicine could take its place. Now, however, ladies and children take HAMBURG FIGS, and like them. 25 cents. Dose, one Fig. Mack Drug Co., N. Y. For sale by J. G. Miller.

THREE KINDS!

I know
The past, and thence I will essay to glean
A warning for the future, so that man
May profit by his errors, and derive
Experience from his folly.—SHELLEY.

Then comes the thoughtless man, who wends his way to the fashionable tailor, gets a good suit, but pays a very big price for the same.

The wise man deals with some reputable manufacturer of Clothing and secures garments fully equal to those made to order at about half custom prices. Thus the wise man gets his Clothing, with quality and workmanship thrown in, as cheap as the foolish man his miserable trash. An unusually large number of wise men are being attracted to our store this Spring. Whether it's a case of "once bitten twice shy" or not, we don't know, but certainly their patronage of does credit to their good judgment, and we don't think, once having traded here they'll be caught by clap-trap again. We know what we sell. We make it, and neither time, effort or money is spared to produce garments that will do us credit and still further establish our reputation. It's a selfish interest we take, we'll admit, but the effect is the same. It's there, and it pays both you and us.

FORTUNES IN TRIFLES.

Pocket-Books That Cost More Than They Ever Carry.

A Rage for Articles in New Kinds of Leather—Elephant Skin and Lizard Skin in Common Use—Walking Sticks with Jeweled Heads.

Half the well-dressed women of New York carry pocket-books that cost more money than they ever contain, says the New York Star. Just study the ponderous, metal-bound leather cases, which every woman grasps in her little fist when she goes shopping, and you'll learn something that few men have hitherto suspected. The practice of carrying the [illegible] purse high aloft in the fist will not die out as long as [illegible] a chance to exhibit costly trifles in leather to a wondering world of men.

Nearly $100 for a little bit of gold-bound leather that scarce fills the rosy palm for which it was made! That is the price. The leather is a gold-tinted lizard skin, with all the scales shining. The gold is richly chased. Every thing within and without is costly and beautiful. Perhaps New York has not yet reached the point of making silk purses out of a certain material proverbially unfit for such use, but very pretty pocket-books are made out of the animal's skin. [illegible] Not in the least; the beast has been deodorized. Its skin is beautifully grained, soft and pliant. A famous currier in this town has recently been making odd experiments in leathers. The result is that the Australian rabbit, the American elk, the peccary, the reindeer, the [illegible], the badger, the monkey, the coon, the buffalo and even the elephant have yielded up their outer covering to gratify the whims of fair women. You may buy an elephant purse for $20 or $30. The skin looks like cork, being of neutral tint, with odd pin holes penetrating the surface. It is tough and marvelously durable. A few traveling bags have been made of it. They weigh a good deal when [illegible] and they [illegible] rather more than [illegible] apiece. Pocket-books of buffalo skin are pretty, and the leather is extremely pliant, though stout.

All these new leathers have driven out the old-fashioned morocco. Every thing must be expensively ornamented with silver or gold. The lizard skin comes in twenty or thirty varieties. They are brought ready-cured from South America. They are big enough, by careful piecing, to be made into small traveling bags. There is a popular notion that every scaled and mottled skin is that of a snake. As a matter of fact, snake skins are comparatively rare.

The last elephant skin used in New York was cured here, and very successfully cured. It went into pocket-books, note-books, portfolios, traveling bags, and what not. The thickest portions had to be split. It is so tough that it has to be worked with specially strong tools. When all the skin had been worked up one of the great feet was made the pedestal of a unique umbrella stand. The great toes, looking like big and badly-broken teeth, had an odd appearance. The body of the stand is of brass, with a large elephant's head in front armed with fantastically unsupported nickel-plated tusks.

Among the rich there is a rage for unique objects, such as pocket-books, purses, [illegible]

[illegible] in silver sells for $20. Prices then run down to $10, $8 and $5. On such sticks the heads have more or less familiar designs.

The modified sticks are [illegible]. A certain variety of small diameter brings, unmounted, more than $50 per stick. Prices then run down to $5 per stick. An odd stick is of wood completely veneered with tortoise shell. It looks like a solid stick of shell.

There is something of a rage for turning relics into heads for umbrellas and walking sticks. One man had the handle of a handsome old dagger placed on an umbrella. Ancient coins are also turned into heads.

CHARMING BOOK-AGENT.

How She Makes a Handsome Income—Tricks of the Trade.

I was an observer a few days ago, writes a New York correspondent, of a well-known book agent's methods, as they were plied in the down-town office of a wealthy New York lawyer. The agent is an exceedingly pretty woman of about thirty-five, I imagine. Her face is singularly beautiful, and her figure would delight the soul of an artist. She is what is called truly "fetching," and her descent upon a male victim means success almost every time. In this instance she sold her unwilling purchaser an encyclopedic set for $175. She calls only upon men and cleverly receives all the attentions which are continually paid her. She is married, but never goes to any pains to tell the fact. [illegible]

A BOSTON HEROINE.

An Old Lady Scares Off Robbers with the Silver They Are After.

There is an old lady living on Columbus avenue, writes the Boston correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, whose particular weakness has always been a dread that she would be robbed of her silver. She has a great quantity of valuable old family plate, some of it dating back to revolutionary times, when such treasure was not so very plentiful among the early colonists. For fear of burglars she always keeps it in her bed-room at night, a maid-servant assisting her each evening to lug it up in a big basket to the third story front. One night last week the robbers so long expected came. The old lady, ever on the alert for such an event, heard them below. She was frightened for her own safety, nobody else being in the house at the time but the maid-servant [illegible]

Romance and Reality.

"It is easy for married couples to quarrel and bring themselves to the point of divorce," said a well-known New Yorker recently to a New York Sun reporter. "After I had been married three months I came home one night to tell my wife that business would keep me away from her the next twenty-four hours. She was girlish, and by way of reply she gave herself a little hug, with a little [illegible] of her body thrown in, and expressed her feelings in an exclamation of unmistakable joy. A BAR HARBOR IDYL.

How a Young Woman's Poodle Was Libeled by a Wicked Man.

Once on a time there was at one of the Bar Harbor hotels a young woman from New York who was, to speak within bounds, a mass of affectations. She had more airs than a hand-organ, and, says the Boston Courier, they were of the same artificial character. She was the laughing-stock of the guests at the house and there were numberless jokes at her expense which she had not apparently the wit to appreciate. Miss X. had a poodle on which she lavished the choicest treasures of her affection. [illegible]

A TENDERFOOT'S LUCK.

He Relates How He Shot His First Buffalo.

He Crept Up on the Herd, Blazed Away, and a Noble Bull Bit the Dust—An Unprofitable and Decidedly Disagreeable Surprise.

One day, while I was ticket agent of the Kansas Pacific railroad at Wallace, Kan., during the years that buffalo were still roaming in vast herds over the plains, the telegraph operator at the station came into my office in a great state of excitement, writes a New York Sun correspondent.

"There's a million buffalo feeding on the prairie only three miles below here," he exclaimed, "and not more than a quarter of a mile from the railroad track. Let's go down and bag a few."

I was still a tenderfoot in the region, and was crazy to kill a buffalo. So, in less than ten minutes after the operator brought me that news, we mounted a hand-car, and, accompanied by one of the track repairers, were spinning along toward the spot where the buffaloes were reported to be feeding. The report hadn't been exaggerated, except that the buffaloes were feeding no nearer than a mile from the track. That was the first herd of buffalo I had seen. I saw many a big one afterward, but never saw one that would compare in vastness with this great bison gathering. The prairie seemed filled with them. They formed one black, unbroken, undulating mass that seemed bounded only at the horizon and stretched eastward and westward as far as the eye could follow it. The herd was on the north side of the railroad, and feeding toward it. Deserting our hand-car and taking our guns, we proceeded cautiously across the prairie, half creeping, half crawling, until we had succeeded in approaching to within a quarter of a mile of the advance guard of the mighty host.

As we lay there watching the systematic arrangement and conduct of the vast herd, its divisions and subdivisions and line of outposts, our attention was attracted by the peculiar actions of various members of one of the bunches which was feeding nearest to us. First one buffalo would give a sudden jump, run several steps, stop and look back, and then, giving his body a thorough shaking, would resume his feeding again, only to repeat his strange maneuvers a few seconds later. Another and another were affected in the same way, and, one after another, they finally fell abruptly to the ground, and lay stretched motionless there at full length.

"It seems to me," said I in a whisper to my companion, "that rattlesnakes are getting in their work on those buffaloes."

"No," said the trackman, who seemed to know something about buffalo, "the prairie rattlesnake can't kill a buffalo. Not as quick as those fellows have gone down, anyhow. I never saw any thing like that before, and can't understand it."

To solve the mystery, we concluded to fire into that particular bunch, which would stampede it, and in turn send the entire herd speeding away over the plain. I was allowed the privilege of first fire. I crawled up to within three hundred yards of the bunch. A magnificent spike bull stood within easy range, broadside to me. I aimed at him and fired. He fell where he stood. His immediate companions fled. The alarm spread along the herd, and soon the vast body was thundering away to the northward, shaking the prairie by their mighty tread. Followed by my comrades, I rushed up to my trophy. I put my foot on his massive neck, and felt proud of my achievement. I looked back at my companions. They were standing stock still ten feet behind me, their eyes staring at something beyond me and their jaws dropping. I turned to see what they were [illegible]

We interpreted this lightly to mean that the Indian wanted a chew of tobacco. Simultaneously all three of us produced a big plug, and reached it toward him. He took them all, bit off a chew from one, and stowed the three away somewhere in his breech-cloth. Then, with a wicked leer, he waved his hand toward the railroad. We interpreted this to mean that we had better go, and we went. The mystery of the strange actions of the buffaloes we had seen fall was explained. The Indians had been lying on the edge of the herd, and were picking off the choicest of them with their noiseless and deadly arrows. We never looked back until we had reached our hand-car on the track and were to start for home. Then we saw the Indians squatted in an excited group on the ground.

"They are gambling for our tobacco," said the trackman.

That was the way I shot and lost my first buffalo, and I have often congratulated myself since that I didn't lose my scalp, and always wondered why that villainous redskin happened to let me keep it.

JILTED BY STEWART.

A Pretty Irish Girl Who Was the Millionaire's First Sweetheart.

Near Lakeview cemetery is an old burying ground formerly used by the people residing in Euclid and surrounding villages, says the Cleveland Plain Dealer. Among other lots is one containing three green mounds, carefully kept and planted, over each of which is a modest slab of white marble. On one is cut the name of William Morrow, on another that of David Morrow, and on the third that of Abbie Morrow. An old resident of the locality said of the family: "I knew the Morrows well. William and David were brothers, and A[illegible], their sister, kept house for them. They were nice quiet people, although somewhat peculiar. The sister was never known to smile, and no wonder, for she died of a broken heart."

The Morrows lived near Belfast, Ireland, on a farm they called "The Knock." They were in comfortable circumstances, had been well educated, and were Presbyterians in faith. Near by them in Ireland lived the father of the late A. T. Stewart. The two families were intimate and the children grew up together. Young A. T. Stewart and Abbie Morrow were childish lovers, although Stewart was several years her senior.

When a lad Stewart, as is well known, left Ireland and made his way to New York to better his fortunes. He corresponded regularly with his little sweetheart across the waters, and it was understood that when he had prospered he was to go back to Ireland and marry the lass he had left behind. Years rolled by and death came. First it took away Abbie's father, and a few months later the mother, unable to bear her grief, followed her husband. The children retained the farm and prospered fairly. Stewart's father was dead and his old mother lived on her little place and strained her eyes hopefully toward America. Finally she died and Stewart went to Ireland to settle the estate.

While there he renewed his engagement with Abbie Morrow and spoke so well of the United States that William and David Morrow were induced to sell their farm, and, with Abbie, came with their former friend to New York. Stewart realized about $800 from his mother's estate, which he invested in Irish linens and laces. These he had shipped to New York, and they formed the foundation of the great establishment that afterward bore his name.

The Morrows had friends in Northern Ohio and so they came to Cleveland. They purchased a farm in East Cleveland township, built a comfortable house, and were soon known as substantial citizens. This was nearly sixty years ago. They seldom visited the village of Cleveland unless it was to purchase supplies or dispose of produce.

A few months after they came to Ohio A. T. Stewart paid them a visit. He was cordially welcomed as the fiance of the sister, remained a few days and returned to New York. That was the last Abbie Morrow ever saw of him. He was doing well in New York and was rapidly making a fortune. His letters became brief and less frequent, and finally ceased altogether. Finally the news of his marriage reached the brothers. They kept it from their sister as long as they could, but were at last compelled to tell her of her lover's inconstancy. She was too high-spirited to peddle her grief among her acquaintances and kept about her household duties in a quiet manner for thirty years. Then they laid her away in a tomb in the corner of the farm. Afterward her remains were taken up and interred here. Every year during her life Stewart sent her a silk dress, but she never wore any of them. As fast as she received them they were laid away untouched, and when she died the brothers returned them all to the donor. She received many offers of marriage, but never again put her trust in man.

STEAMSHIP STATISTICS.

The Enormous Profits Made During the Summer Months.

Immense Quantities of Delicacies and Necessaries Consumed on an Ocean Passage—Disagreeable News for Prohibitionists.

There is an enormous profit in the steamship business during the spring and summer months, the gross receipts, according to the Boston Herald, from a single voyage frequently rising above $100,000. When the Etruria, the Umbria, the City of New York or any other of the great liners leave their docks with from 500 to 600 passengers, as they do regularly every week between the middle of April and the middle of July, receipts from the cabins average more than $100 for each person, and represent in the aggregate $60,000. The other sources of income from the ship, such as freight, the mails, the steerage and the bar, amount to almost as much again. There is not a vessel on the ocean that can seat more than 250 people in the main dining-room. For this reason there are two dinners served when the passenger list runs above that number, and you are asked at the office whether you prefer the first or second dinner—one at 5:30 the other at 7—and this, with the number of your room, is put on the purser's list with the number of your place at table, and when it is once fixed no change will be made. An officer presides at each of the main tables and the highest honor is to sit at the captain's table—if possible on his right or left—and great tact is required to arrange the seats satisfactorily and give no cause for jealousy among the passengers. The perishable food only is bought in this country and such things as melons, oysters, peaches, cigars, tomatoes and other articles that are cheaper and better here than abroad, together with the necessary supply of coal to carry the ship across the Atlantic. All of the groceries and wines are purchased on the other side, the supply being laid in for the round trip.

When a vessel of the first class is lying at her dock in New York in the spring months, with nearly a thousand people to feed for seven or eight days, she lays in an enormous amount of provisions, which are put in the ice-room. Of fresh beef the usual amount is 12,500 pounds, with 700 pounds of corned beef, 5,500 pounds of mutton, 850 pounds of lamb, 350 pounds of veal and the same amount of pork, and about 2,000 pounds of fresh fish. These figures may well make the thrifty house-wife stare in open-eyed wonder. What would she do with the fifteen tons of potatoes put aboard every ten days. These ocean greyhounds are well supplied with game, as the list of the head cook, which was recently seen by the writer, showed 300 brace of grouse as being put aboard for a single voyage, with 800 fowls, 300 chickens, 100 ducks, 50 geese and 50 turkeys, besides thirty hampers of vegetables, 220 quarts of ice-cream, 1,000 quarts of milk and 11,000 eggs. It is said that if the ocean dried up you could trace the route of the transatlantic steamers by rows of empty champagne bottles between here and Europe, which is not surprising, seeing that the Cunard line alone uses about 26,000 bottles of champagne per year. The bar is a most important department on a large passenger ship, and the profit from this source is said to often exceed $5,000 from one trip. All of its goods are put on at Liverpool for the round trip, or at Havre or Bremen.

The consumption for one voyage includes 1,100 bottles of champagne, 850 bottles of claret, 6,000 bottles of ale, 2,000 of porter, 4,500 of mineral water and 650 bottles of various spirits. Lemons are used on an average of 1½ per head per day, apples 2¾ per head per day and oranges at the rate of 3 per head per day. The groceries for the [illegible]

SAVED HER CHILD.

The Ingenuity of a Mother Whose Babe Was in Danger.

A most remarkable rescue from death took place at the farm of Wendell Russell, about three miles from [illegible], Ill., the other afternoon, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Mr. Russell had removed the pump from the well to make some repairs and had partially covered the aperture with boards. A little four-year-old boy playing in the vicinity got on these boards and fell through, one of the boards going with him. His mother heard his cries and rushed to the rescue. There was about twelve feet of water in the well, and the distance from the top to the surface of the water was about fifteen feet. She could see the little one clinging to the board and floating on the water. No assistance was at hand and she was thrown on her own resources. Her wits worked quickly and she acted with great promptness. Securing a stout rope that was near at hand, she fastened one end of it tightly about the body of her nine-year-old daughter and then let her down to the water, where she grabbed the little one and shouted to her mother to pull her up. Her mother could not do it. While it was a comparatively easy matter to lower the girl steadily and to hold her it was quite another thing to haul her up, and the mother's strength was not equal to the task. She, however, found a way out of the dilemma. With a few words of encouragement to her loved ones clinging to each other just above the surface of the water, she made the rope fast above and ran to put a ladder that was leaning against the house. This she let down the well, but it reached only a little below the surface of the water, and there was nothing for it to rest on. She secured a stout piece of timber and placed it across the top of the well between the top rounds of the ladder, thus giving it a firm support, though the lower end swung in a manner somewhat dangerous to an unsteady climber. Then she took the rope by which her daughter was suspended and swung her to the ladder. The girl seized the ladder with her left hand, and with her little brother tightly clasped by her right arm, climbed the ladder, assisted by her mother with the rope. Both were brought up safely, and the only injuries sustained were a few bruises and a thorough soaking to the little [illegible]

FREEHOLDERS' PROCEEDINGS.

OFFICIAL.

ELIZABETH, N. J., August 1, 1889.

Regular meeting of the board of chosen freeholders, of the county of Union, held on Thursday, August 1, 1889, at 2.30 o'clock p. m.

Present—Director Hubbard and Freeholders Briant, Doty, Donahue, Howard, Houston, Jones, Kyte, Kleinhans, Pierson, Roll, Thompson, Van Saun, Vanderbeek, Wright, West, Whaley—17.

Absent—None.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and, on motion, approved as read.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Union:

GENTLEMEN—I wish to call your attention to the fact that the recent rains have caused a freshet that has done considerable damage to the bridges and culverts of the county.

In Plainfield the most damage has been done, where several bridges in the county and line bridges between this county and Somerset county have been completely carried away.

There have been also other bridges destroyed or badly damaged throughout the county, and it is necessary that some action be taken by this board at once to have the said bridges destroyed, rebuilt, and those damaged repaired.

I therefore would suggest that such action be taken in this matter as this board may deem proper.

Dated August 1, 1889.

J. F. HUBBARD,
Director.

On motion of Freeholder Vanderbeek received and ordered placed on file.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

To the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Union:

GENTLEMEN:—In regard to certain resolutions passed by this board requesting me to communicate with the Baltimore and New York and Lehigh Valley railroads, concerning where they cross the county roads and ascertain if they would elevate their tracks over the same, would respectfully report that I have received communications from the chief engineer of the B. & N. Y. R. R., and also from Mr. Pickel of the Lehigh Valley R. R., which are hereto annexed.

In regard to poles of the N. Y. and N. J. Telephone company that are in the centre or other part of St. George avenue, I saw the superintendent of said company and he said he was perfectly willing to remove any or all poles in the line of the road and would proceed to do so at once. I do not anticipate any trouble from that source.

Yours respectfully,
E. D. WARD,
County Attorney.

Dated August 1, 1889.

On motion of Freeholder Thompson received and placed on file.

RESOLUTIONS.

By Freeholder Briant:

CAREER OF A $1 BILL.

Created in Meredith's Mill—The National Debts it Can Pay.

It Pours Through the Treasury Hopper, Besides the Gold, Silver and Copper, in Torrents of Millions a Day—Improvements in Money Making.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

Nothing is more interesting than the birth, life and death of a dollar greenback—its procreation, occupation and maceration, so to speak.

I have just inspected the big government factory where 1,000 men are employed, every one of whom, handles enough money every hour to make him rich (half of these men are women, but I use the term advisedly, for Susan Anthony has repeatedly alleged, relying on information and observation for her knowledge that "men" embrace "women").

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing, of which Captain W. M. Meredith is the chief, turns out—but to make the matter plain, let me begin at the beginning, a good ways farther back. Let me go back to the first "on demand" notes issued by the Government.

And to make it very plain, let me take the stand as a witness, at the risk of talking about myself and being egotistical.

About the time of the first Bull Run I became a correspondent of the New York "Tribune" with the army of the Potomac, and, incidentally (after the fashion of that time), a clerk in the Treasury Department. I was put into a long room where, during the months of autumn, thirty of us were engaged from morning till night in signing treasury notes—the first issue by Secretary Chase. Each clerk signed his own name under the words "for the Treasurer." I signed two million dollars worth, or so, and for ten years thereafter I often came across bills bearing my name. The notes were payable "on demand" and soon became as good as gold when all other credit went to wreck.

After a few months this expensive method of attesting the currency was superseded by machinery. One day S. M. Clark, Chief of the Construction Bureau, went to Mr. Chase, and said:

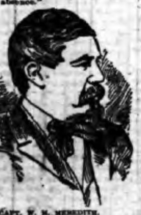
"Mr. Chase, I can release those fellows from that jail and save you a lot of money."

"How?" asked the great Secretary.

"I will make a machine to sign Spinner's autograph a hundred times as fast."

"Can that be done?"

"Certainly; give me three weeks' leave of absence."



CAPT. W. M. MEREDITH.

The request was granted. Clark came back with the machines, and we were released for other work.

Another revolution was shortly effected. The notes we signed were born four upon a sheet, and from our tables they were carried to another room where a score of women—the first who were introduced into Government service—cut them apart with long shears.

"I can do that clipping much better with a machine," said Clark.

"Go ahead and make it," said Chase.

It was made; brought; used. It did the work beautifully. But the girls who ran it tried to break it, so that the work could still be done by hand at greater expense. These cartilaginous political economists wore, like all the women of that queer day, hoop-skirts around them expanding their clothes as large as a hogshead. These iron hoops they used to stick in between the shears, disabling them by dulling, and then pleading that they were "good for nothing."

Clark put down the rebellion with a strong hand, and the machines are doing the same work to-day.

The first notes were made by the American Bank Note Company, but when the issues multiplied, Mr. Chase found that he must do his own work.

"You cannot do it," said the favored company.

"Why not?" asked the Secretary.

"You cannot make a number of dies exactly similar without a transfer press on which steel in a soft state can take the impression. There are only two makers in the United States, and we have hired them for ten years."

The troubled Secretary sought his Chief of Construction and told the dilemma.

Mr. Clark said, "It is true. They have hired those men to keep you from getting the presses. But they can be made piece-meal. Give me two months and I will put twenty of them at work."

He scoured the country for skill; made contracts for a bit of the press here and another bit there; and within the time specified the presses were at work, and the government was printing its own notes. This was the egg from which Capt. Meredith's spurred game chicken was hatched.

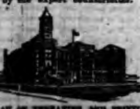
Clark was true to his old boss, and when the New York Democratic Convention of 1868 failed to nominate the Chief Justice for President his faithful henchman's lamentations caused him to be regarded as an "offensive partisan," and he had to "move on." He is now, I believe, a clerk in the Agricultural Department.

When the rays of expiring day casts a long shadow eastward from the Washington monument, its top almost touches the handsome pile of brick buildings which shelter the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Above its roof a steam-pipe coughs and exhales white vapor and a tall chimney spits black smoke that sends argosies of clouds to Richmond.

Here a thousand human beings make money—a vast volume every day. Not real "truly" money, but the substantial shadow of money; national bank currency and greenbacks; not values, but evidence of indebtedness; not money, but promises to pay money, which, with cash behind them, are even more acceptable than cash itself. It is one of those rare cases where the shadow is preferred to the substance.

To the weaving of these artistic shadows Capt. Meredith's official brood devotes its talent and time.

Perhaps the most fascinating part of the whole process is the engraving of the plate on steel. The entire face of a note is never engraved by one man except by the expert counterfeiter. In this bureau not less than twelve engravers work on a single plate—one a specialist in portraits, another a specialist in vignettes, another a specialist in script, another a specialist in scroll-work or border, and so on. It often takes six months to engrave one plate.



BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING IN WASHINGTON.

Now it is ready to print from, but a single plate would not answer a quarter of the demand. Many presses must print at once from plates that are exactly alike. Only in one way can such a plate be multiplied. It is hardened and across its face is passed a heavy roller of soft steel. Then the depressions of the plate appear on the roller in raised lines, and when the roller is hardened it is a perfect die. From this roller is made the numerous plates required, by rolling it alternately upon soft steel plates and then hardening the plates. Each plate complete, containing the faces or backs of four notes, costs about $2,000.

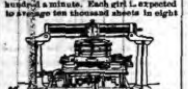
The paper of all our current bonds and bank notes is made at Dalton, Mass., by a process that is kept secret. In co-operation with the manufacturers in keeping the secret, Capt. Meredith has prohibited the carrying away of any paper by anybody—even the waste shreds clipped from the sides of the bills. The penalty for having any of this unprinted paper in one's possession is a fine of $5,000 and imprisonment. The two single threads of colored silk running lengthwise of every Government bill are inwoven by a process that has never been successfully repeated by counterfeiters.

There are 200 plate printers, and each one can print from $8,000 to $100,000 a day, assisted by a woman who lays the paper on the plate and takes it off. The printers business is to ink the plate with a roller, wipe off all the surface ink, polish the surface with the hand rubbed on chalk, and then pull the impression with a lever. It is a very primitive method of printing, and it cannot be long before Congress recovers from the insanity which seized it last winter and returns to the superb steam presses which now stand huddled at the end of the building, powerful but powerless, like elephants blanketed and in chains. It is known that a steam press will do three times as much as a hand press for the same expenditure, and the work on the backs of bills is so nearly identical that nobody can pick out the bills.

Very few sheets are spoiled—not more than one or two in a hundred. From the time the paper is received till it is sent to the Treasury Department printed and signed, it is counted thirty-eight times to make certain that none have "got away" at any stage. If one sheet is missing all are prisoners in the office until the error is rectified. Sometimes the office runs for months without a single sheet being even temporarily missed.

I have spoken of greenbacks, only, but, in fact, all the government evidence of indebtedness are printed here—the national bank issues, the bonds and the internal revenue stamps. In one recent year the bureau printed and delivered $268,000,000 worth of bank-notes and bonds, besides 500,000,000 revenue stamps. It once printed $140,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds in thirty days. All the postage stamps are made in New York.

One of the most interesting processes, because of its extreme dexterity, is that of examining printed sheets to see if they are well done. The women to whom this service is entrusted are lightning calculators, rapid of brain, eye and finger tips. I timed one girl who was inspecting these sheets and she kept half a dozen in the air, all the while. The Chinese juggler's fans are no where in comparison. A part of the time she dipped the sheets at the rate of one hundred a minute. Each girl is expected to average ten thousand sheets in eight hours. It is marvelous how quickly this eye detected sheets that were soiled, or torn a bit, or slightly out of register. The pupil of the eye must have had exceeding flexibility enabling it to expand on emergency and spread all over a sheet measuring 10x14 inches.



THE WONDERFUL GEOMETRIC LATHE.

When the sheets, whether of notes or bonds are finished by the Bureau, they are still ineligible to pass as Currency. They are carted to the Treasury Department to get the finishing touch—the red seal which is the Government's attestation of genuineness. This distinguishing mark is printed on by a steam press, under the eye of Secretary Windom, the final accounting officer, and bears the legend "Thesaur. Amer. Septent. Sigil." Some years since, in Bellagio, Italy, I offered some greenbacks in payment for a piece of satin. To my surprise the merchant took it unhesitatingly, but he carefully took up each bill and scrutinized.

"What for?" I asked him.

"To see if as vossa—vot you say?—red—red mark ees print sere," he answered.

The Government never reissues its registered bonds. Whenever a bond is sold, the old one is taken up and chewed to pulp by the mill whose jaws are all the while busy macerating worn-out currency, and a new bond is issued in its place.

When the Bureau is closed for the night, all the steel plates and rolls and all the sheets of notes, stamps and bonds are carefully counted and verified, and deposited in the vaults, and receipts for them are passed before any employe is permitted to leave the building. When I called to inspect the immense establishment, Capt. Meredith said, "Please make one thing plain, that no Government plate can ever be stolen or 'borrowed' from here for a minute. Our checks are so simple and elaborate as to make it impossible." I may say, in passing, that Capt. Meredith seems admirably equipped for his position, being quite able to take the place of any man at a press at any moment, and, of course, knowing exactly the conditions for attaining the best results.

The most attractive room in the building to me is the little corner where silently works the wonderful geometric lathe. This is the machine which engraves on the plate those involved curvelinear figures which appear upon the backs of all bank notes, and as a base for figures on their faces. It is a marvel of human ingenuity. Description of it is very difficult. The standards which support the mandrel are not fixed at right angles to the bed, but are capable of oscillating backwards and forwards in plane parallel to the plane, of rotation. The graver is held in a slide-rest above, and the plate, resting on the top of the standard, receives on its face definite and symmetrical deviations from a circle producing beautiful effects. In the devices exhibited were rosettes and roses, and many floral symbols, snow-flakes seen on a glass, and a thousand figures of the most lovely lace. The base of the standard swings irregularly north and south, the second section, resting on it and partaking of its motion, vibrates also east and west, and the upper section sharing the eccentric motions of the other two, turns also on a pivot at its center. The result is the geometric figures on the bank-notes.

The curious thing about it is that no lathe can be set twice exactly alike, so that every plate is necessarily unique.

W. A. CROFFUT.

Parrot in Place of Monkey.

The Philadelphia Record says a strolling Italian musician in that city has an improvement on the monkey. It is a parrot which sings operatic music in a soprano voice that is heard for squares and then collects coins from high windows. The bird can fly where the monkey would fail to reach.

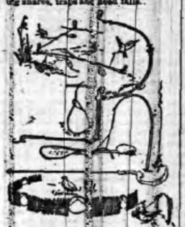
GAME TRAPS AND SNARES.

The Various Kinds and How to Construct Them.

Simple Devices for Capturing Game Invented by the Indians—Some of Them Are the Product of Yankee Ingenuity.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

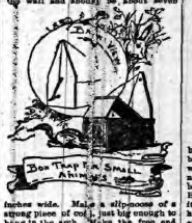
Now that the breech-loading shot-gun and rifle are in such general use the old fashioned method of snaring and trapping game are seldom practiced. Still the demands of the bird fanciers and others for live specimens of rare birds, and of the fur market for uninjured furs, keeps alive the art of properly constructing snares, traps and dead falls.



First and foremost among the simplest snares made is what is known as "set lines." To begin with it is essential to find a spot most frequented by the birds you wish to snare. The spot selected should be, for a limited space at least, fairly smooth. Provide yourself with a jack-knife, some strong cord, a quantity of horsehair and two bits of hard wood. Make the two small stakes about six inches long and drive them down into the ground at a distance of fifteen feet apart. Run a strong cord taut and flat on the ground from one stake to the other, taking care to securely attach it at either end. At intervals of a foot or more bind securely to the main cord little branching slip nooses of horsehair. These nooses when spread out should be about six inches in diameter. In the loops sprinkle some grain seeds. The snare is now set, but if you wish to take the birds alive the set lines should be carefully watched lest the snared birds in their exertions to get away should beat themselves to death against the ground.

The partridge snare is a little more scientific in construction, but not at all intricate. The snare proper is simply a slip noose made of strings, but when properly constructed it is very effective. Familiarize yourself with the haunts and habits of the partridge. Bear in mind that partidges and other game birds rarely fly over an obstruction if it is possible to find an opening through which to pass. In constructing the partridge snare begin by erecting a wall of sticks, stones and mud about two feet high and six inches thick. It should be as long as is necessary to enclose a given place, relying on the undulations of the ground or some other natural cause to complete the rest of the enclosure about the partridges' haunts.

Build a few arches in apertures in the wall. The arch should be a bent piece of wood like a croquet wicket in shape. It should extend to the top of the wall and should be about seven inches wide. Make a slip-noose of a strong piece of cord, just big enough to hang in the arch. Make the free end fast to the top of the arch, spread the loops apart and keep them in this position by catching the strings lightly in either side of the arch. The noose should be one inch from the ground and three inches from the top. The partridges in seeking their usual feeding place will naturally walk into the semi-circle, and in endeavoring to get out will poke about until they come to one of the archways. In going through they will be caught in one of the nooses.



Bait View
Box Trap for Small Animals

Another method of catching small birds is in vogue among the Indians to this day. Get a reed, or better still, a bamboo pole about twelve feet long. Plant one end in the ground so that the pole will lean sideways. Cut a birch twig about two feet long with plenty of leaves on it and place it crosswise on top of the pole, at the same time binding it on securely. Place a horsehair noose lightly over the leaves. Pass the end of the horsehair down through the pole and out through a hole bored a foot from the bottom. Tie this end of the horse hair to a strong cord, which in turn is fastened to a rock. The trap is now set and when the bird alights on the top of your pole his feet will invariably draw the noose tight around them and he is caught in very short order.

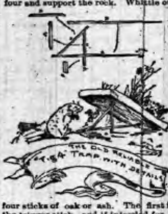
The spring snare is a very simple contrivance, but is an excellent method of catching birds. Cut a switch about five feet long and of good thickness. Bend it in the form of a lawn tennis racket—that is, two feet of the small end of the switch should be curved round and fastened to the body. Place this flat on the ground, make a toy arch, somewhat smaller than the partridge arch and drive it into the ground over the handle of the switch, at a point one foot from the base. The arch should be driven down to within three inches of the switch. Two inches from the arch and towards the bend of the switch make a notch and drive a little peg lightly into it. To a small sapling, which should spring from the ground a few inches, immediately back of the big end of the switch, attach a strong cord. Bend the sapling and attach the free end of the cord to the peg in the handle of the switch, the cord first passing under the arch. The tension should be strong enough so that the least twitch from the bent sapling would free the peg. Now about midway on the cord connecting the peg and the top of the bent sapling attach a light strong string. This runs out as far as the bend in the switch, where it forms a slipnoose. The slipnoose is spread over the curved end of the switch; grain is strewed about and all is ready for the birds.

A very simple snare is made by weaving a net of silk or horsehair in running nooses. Spread it in ground frequented by birds and fasten it down with pegs. Throw some grain about and your snare is complete. Rabbits may also be caught in this same snare.

Fish snares, not meaning nets, are hardly worth the while wasted on them, but one of the simplest made can be described in few words. The pickerel lift is a slip noose of very light copper wire. It should be about three feet long or adapted to the depth in which the fish are lying in the stream. The free end should be attached to a pole about two feet long. From the bank or from your boat with the utmost quietness lower your noose into the water. Slide it up about the fish, working towards the head. Be very careful not to touch the fish with the noose, but when it is about him just back of the gills give a quick jerk, and nine times out of ten you will land your fish.

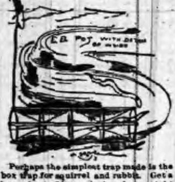
Dead falls are effective if properly constructed in killing anything from a bear to a ground squirrel, and, as the name suggests, carries with it instant death.

The simplest dead fall is made with a flat rock and four hard wood sticks. The weight of the rock depends on what game it is expected to kill. The sticks are put together in the form of the figure four and support the rock. Whittle out four sticks of oak or ash.



The first is the trigger stick, and if intended for a mink fall should be twelve inches long, gradually tapering off to a point at one end. It should be at its thickest part one inch through. In the very middle a sixteenth of an inch notch should be cut and at the thick end on the same side two notches close together. The second stick is the ground support. That should be six inches high and an inch through. One end of it should be small and come to a half inch top. The third stick is the perpendicular post, and should be three inches high, one inch thick and come to a half inch bottom at the small end. The fourth stick is the oblique prop and should be eight inches long planed off at either end to angles for supporting the rock and fitting into the notch. The flat stone should be as heavy as the figure four will support. To set the trap the following directions should be observed. Place the ground support in an upright position. On top of it at right angles place the trigger stick, so that the part just beneath the middle notch shall rest on the ground support. Fit the oblique prop into either of the end notches. In the middle notch of the trigger stick place the small end of the perpendicular post, the oblique prop resting on the other end of the perpendicular post. Your trap will now resemble the figure four and you will find that the free end of your oblique prop will easily support the heavy stone. Bait the trigger stick with odorous bait and all is in readiness. The animal seizes the bait, loosens the prop and the rock falls on him.

Another dead fall is made by drawing two parallel lines of stakes on either side of a heavy log so as to completely fence in an enclosure save at the ground end of the log, where a little opening is left for an entrance. At one end the log should be elevated and supported by a figure four trap. Put strong bait on the trigger and await results.



Perhaps the simplest trap made is the box trap for squirrel and rabbit. Get a box about fifteen inches long, eight wide and eight inches deep. The ordinary soap box will answer. Halve the box by removing the top and one end. Hinge the top on to the end from which it has just been removed—leather hinges will do very nicely. At the same end nail in an upright position a stick twelve inches high; bore a half-inch hole through the middle of the same end of the box and put through it a trigger of a figure four trap; run a string from the top of the opening end of the box, over the rear stick, down to the trigger; at this end of the string tie a two-inch sliver of wood set in the notch in the trigger and a notch in the end of the box, an inch higher than the hole through which the trigger extends. The box is now open and your trap set. Bait the trigger with sweet apple or an ear of corn. The rabbit or squirrel enters the trap, nibbles the bait and loosens the trigger. With a snap the cover falls and you've bagged your game.

For all large game the familiar snap steel traps cannot be improved upon.

In a wild turkey trap you have to rely in a large measure on the natural stupidity of the bird. A four-sided pen of proportions best adapted to ground on which you elect to erect it, is built of twigs and grasses. The walls should be about two feet high. For a roof use pine or hemlock boughs and weight them down securely; leave one very small opening in your wall and in it leading into the pen strew corn. The turkey eats its way in. Once inside and having consumed all the food, the bird looks for an egress, but in turkey fashion endeavors to get out through the roof. The opening in the side is small and the in-turned twigs prove an effectual barrier. He never thinks of trying to crowd out the way he came in and is, therefore, a close prisoner until released.

The handiest kind of an eel pot, and one which can be easiest constructed, is made of barrel hoops and strips of wood. Get these ordinary barrel hoops, place them at a distance of one foot apart and nail over it strips of wood. The strips of wood should be an inch wide and half an inch in thickness. Nail these strips on longitudinally half an inch apart. The object of this is to have these apertures of sufficient width to permit the water to freely pass through, but yet not wide enough to allow the eel to escape. At the ends invert your strips to an imaginary point twelve inches within the middle of the pot. When the sticks come to almost a point leave an opening just large enough for the eel to squeeze through. The trap is now complete. Bait it with small fish and anchor it. Attach a float to a line which connects the trap to a float on the surface of the water. This marks where your eel pot is set.

A Swindled Emigrant.

An old German peasant arrived at Castle Garden one day last week whose experience is an example of how foreigners are duped by tales of American wealth. He had been told by an emigrant agent that gold was so plenty in this country that the people gave golden trinkets to the children to play with, and trimmed the carriages, buildings and street lamps with golden ornaments. He accordingly sold his little place, and after buying a ticket to New York, spent the remainder of his money, with the exception of a few francs, in giving his neighbors a banquet. On his arrival here he had just seven francs left. The old man was deplorably ignorant, and when it dawned on his mind how he had been duped, he wept like a child. He will be sent back.

A MUSCULAR CHRISTIAN.

He Wipes the Floor with a Scoffer and Then Weeps for His Anger.

The Detroit correspondent of the Chicago Inter Ocean tells a good story about H. O. Wills, the evangelist, who was long a noted bummer in that town.

Persons who knew Wills in the old days appreciated the struggle he was making toward a better life. A few, however, began with his change of character to jeer and jibe him in season and out of season, seeking to drive him by ridicule back into the gutters. One of these is a man named Dolton, who for several years has sought opportunity to abuse Brother Wills on the streets and especially on the street-cars. Wills, though a powerful man physically, bore this outrage uncomplainingly for a time.

Recently Wills boarded a street-car and found his tormentor there. Several ladies were also in the car. Dolton began his petty persecutions. Wills stood it with remarkable patience for a time; then he begged Dolton to desist. This had no effect, and Wills asked the conductor of the bob-tail to quiet his persecutor. Another gentleman passenger also urged the conductor to go to Wills' assistance, but with no result. Then Wills turned to Dolton: "My friend, you must stop this kind of monkey work. I can't do any thing while there are ladies in the car, but I warn you that unless you let up on your abuse I'll trouble you."

Dolton laughed derisively. The ladies got out. Dolton resumed his taunts, becoming more and more abusive. His victim again issued a note of warning, but Dolton believed that the evangelist's religion would not permit him to retaliate.

Suddenly it came clearly to Wills that to get an answer to his prayer for protection from the tormentor he must use the means placed in his hand, and he sailed into Dolton.

He mopped every part of the car with the person of his tormentor. The swish-swash of the body around the car could be heard a block away above the din and roar of the busy thoroughfare.

Dolton cried for mercy, but Brother Wills had a duty to perform, and he did it nobly. Not until Dolton was thoroughly whipped, until he admitted his meanness, did Wills let up. Then, with a parting shake of the trembling man's hand, the evangelist said: "Now you go home and thank God that I did not kill you."

Wills then sank into the seats and sobbed over his giving way to anger. Later he went to Justice Miner and explained the circumstances. The judge congratulated him for the good work, and Brother Wills was happy.

THE OCEAN ON TAP.

A Boston Man Discovers a Subterranean Arm of the Sea.

If the refined Bostonian desires a bath in old ocean's stimulating brine he is no longer compelled to seek it—in case circumstances compel him to endure the summer's heat in town—by a journey to the beach. He can obtain one almost at a moment's notice, writes a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, by simply stepping into a certain establishment on one of our main thoroughfares in the heart of the city. Here is found what is boasted to be the most gorgeous and complete plant for administering ablutions in the Turkish style so far known in the United States. It was only opened the other day and its most remarkable feature is the facilities it offers for sea-bathing on the spot.

The proprietor of the concern, as a preliminary to starting it, sunk an artesian well on the premises and struck, not fresh water, as he had expected, but a vein of the purest sea-flood, which came in straight from the Atlantic between two strata of slate at a depth of a little over two hundred feet. This was considered a misfortune, for it costs money to bore into the earth with pipes, and another attempt was made some distance away from the first hole. Two thousand dollars more was expended, and the flow of salt water was struck again. Scientific experts were called, and they said that it was evidently a subterranean branch of the ocean, of no great depth but of unknown extent. The phenomenon was considered so extraordinary that learned Harvard professors have been making it a subject of serious discussion. The owner of the wells was not much interested in the geological aspects of the matter. It merely occurred to him that he was $4,000 out. But at length the notion struck him that he might employ the water most profitably in a different way and make real sea-bathing one of the attractions of his place. So he constructed an enormous tank, to hold many thousands of gallons, and turned the flow of the ocean-wells into it. And now, after going through the sudorific and other exercises incidental to a Turkish bath at this institution, one enjoys the luxury of a delightful and invigorating plunge in the sea.

The tank aforesaid is built, with its accessories, in appropriate imitation of a beautiful ocean grotto. It is lighted by electricity, filtered through colored glass of many tints, which illuminates the walls and roof of what appears to be a rocky cavern. Queer-looking sea-creatures gaze down with shining goggle-eyes upon the inevitable "fat gent," always found at a Turkish bath, who half imagines himself a merman disporting himself gracefully in the Neptunian realm. The scene is altogether weird and well calculated to enhance the pleasures of ablutionary indulgence on the oriental plan.

AN AGED TRAVELER.

A Man 113 Years Old Journeying Alone from Arkansas to Kentucky.

James McMillin, of Bardwell, Ky., says a Cairo (Ill.) letter to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, spent a few hours in this city recently en route home alone from Arkansas, where he has been visiting relatives. Mr. McMillin enjoys the distinction of being the oldest man known in this section of the country and probably in the United States. He was born in Botetourt County, Va., of which Fincastle is the county seat, in the historic year of 1776, and succeeded to his father's name without the change of an initial letter or alteration of orthography. His mother's maiden name was Diana Catwood. His father died at 97 and his mother at 106 from natural causes.

When seventeen years of age "Uncle Jimmie," as he is known to his friends, became one of a colony who, under those two noted Virginians, Peyton Randolph and Stephen Randall, started west "to grow up with the country." They settled in what is now East Tennessee. Subsequently he, with his faithful wife, emigrated to Nashville, Tenn., and engaged in merchandising, serving two terms as sheriff. Later he located at the delta of Yazoo Pass, on the Mississippi, where he became an extensive planter, residing there fifty-three years. In 1881 he came to Bardwell, Ky., where he now lives.

He has been twice married and is a widower now, is the father of twenty-three children, two of whom are living, and they are accounted quite aged. He is fond of tobacco, which he chews, but is opposed to liquor in any shape, and claims not to have drank a drop in eighty-five years. As a souvenir he exhibits a copper coin of the date of 1776, which he has carried since he was twelve years old. He is in possession of documentary evidence with reference to his birth that places beyond doubt his claim to be 113 years of age. His fund of anecdotes is large, and his tales of eighty and ninety years are more interesting and amusing. He is quite strong of limb, mental faculties clear, and travels alone.

"Ten Cents and Three Years of War."

Some years ago Dr. Quint, in a memorial address to a post in Somerville, told how a friend of his seeing his little Grand Army badge at the Congregational House, said:—"That is rather pretty; what did you pay for it?" and that he answered:—"Ten cents and three years of war life. Do you want to buy one?" The point took with the "boys," and he has repeated it in two or three addresses, and last year at New Bedford it went into print. We understand that the chaplain was delighted to learn that the point was so well appreciated that a memorial orator this May, in a large Worcester county town, delighted his audience by telling how a friend of his seeing his Grand Army badge, said to him, "That is quite pretty. What did you pay for it?" and received the same answer—"Ten cents and so many years of war, &c. Do you want to buy one?" or words to that effect. The chaplain says that the idea is not patented and any memorial orator next year is at perfect liberty to tell how a friend seeing his Grand Army badge, said, "This is rather pretty; what did you pay for it?" and receive the same answer—"Ten cents," &c., with expansions to any required extent. Such coincidences are truly delightful.

Don't Undervalue the Importance.

We publish elsewhere a letter from Mr. Bradley, the ruler of Prohibition Asbury Park, which proves he also can be the strongest of temperance advocates without being a fool.

He knows that although under the [illegible] no-license regulations probably in the World, yet liquor is sold extensively and almost openly in Asbury Park as it is in Plainfield.

So Mr. Bradley has come to the same conclusion as THE PRESS, that the sale of liquor is better restricted by the licensing of a few bars, than by the unlimited traffic in a hundred places.

As the Trenton True American says: "What the State needs, and what Mr. Bradley wants, is just such legislation as the Werts bill, which by not undertaking too much succeeds in doing what it undertakes."

BENEFITS OF ILLEGAL SELLING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—The season here at Asbury Park has reached its height, and the population far exceeds that of any previous year, notwithstanding the very rainy season; and the avenues in every direction are lined with wagons loaded with trunks, one or more of which are deposited at every door along the route.

Life by the sea is an hilarious, exciting one, with a whole museum of [illegible] marvels thrown in. One of these marvels was seen sprawled out upon the sand early Sunday evening, thoroughly [illegible]. It was deemed such a curiosity that a large crowd collected to look at the man who dared to commit so foul a crime; but two policemen quietly awakened him and hustled him off to the lockup.

It is this very prohibitory law that makes Asbury Park a marvel of sobriety, peacefulness and security, yet Mr. Bradley is being persuaded to permit high license to rule, since the selling of liquor of all kinds is carried on here in spite of the law against it. To prove the truth of this fact, my next-door neighbor is regularly served with beer, ordered just outside the town limits; and showy beer wagons drive through the streets delivering boxes of beer and other liquors. The only prohibition they observe is the one: "No liquor in bottles, or otherwise, shall be sold by any street vendor to any resident in Asbury Park."

But liquors can be bought in many boarding houses. A young gentleman visiting here accompanied some friends to a fashionable billiard saloon. After finishing their games, and when about to depart, the genial waiter asked them if they were thirsty, and being answered in the affirmative he said he could accommodate them. Having taken their different orders he soon brought in four 'beer' tins; one contained whiskey, another gin, and the other two brandy and cherry. It is safe to say that the young men enjoyed the last game the most, and returned home in higher spirits, owing not alone to the intoxicants which they had imbibed, but to having so cutely dodged the law.

A party of New Yorkers called upon a personal friend in one of the swell hotels and the host served them with the finest liquor. No bar was there, 'oh no!' no money passed between the parties, not a word about the sentiment, but the [illegible] winks and the smacking lips, and the knowledge of getting ahead of the Jerseyites, gave to their parting handshakes an added fervor.

But while the rich and the well-to-do are able to obtain intoxicants, the poor and the laboring classes cannot obtain it. As it is beyond their reach, the temptation to buy it is impossible, therefore we have no drunkards here, no wife beaters, no street brawls and no noises. Women can go about at night in perfect safety. Prohibition also deters footpads, thieves and dishonest persons from entering its precincts. Altogether it is a moral, clean and healthy town, and Mr. Bradley will make a great mistake if he allows any sort of liquor license which will give rum seller's a chance to entice the wage earner to squander upon the broad road that leads to destruction.

LOOKER ON.

Asbury Park, Aug. 26, 1889.

A Big Time on Labor Day.

The grocers, butchers and other merchants of the city belonging to the Protective Association, will have a big time and a clam bake at Boynton Beach, Monday, Sept. 2, in celebration of Labor Day.

All their friends are invited to accompany them, and they expect the attendance will number 300. There will be, among the varied festivities, a ball match between the butchers and grocers, and Will Smalley will pitch for the former.

Making the Delinquents Come to Terms.

Justice V. W. Nash is still on the warpath for delinquent tax-payers, and lately persons who declared that they could not or would not pay up their back taxes when the bills were first sent out, are now coming in to settle "like little men." There are some colored men who still declare that they cannot pay their taxes and signify their intention to leave town before going to jail.

Justice Nash Friday threatened to lock one delinquent up for refusing to square his account, but the man paid his tax and was thus spared the humiliation of going to jail. The Justice also levied upon a lamp in one house, a lounge in another, and an organ in a store on Front street.

WE ARE THE PEOPLE.

When Umpire Keller called game, last Saturday afternoon, the odds were two to one on the Winthrops, with no takers. Every one of the 500 admirers of the Crescents present, however, trusted that the home team would be able to stop this sic of children.

It was with reason expected that the renowned Curries would mow the Plainfield batters down like Autumn leaves before November's gales. That the Winthrops would win was expected, and that the Crescents would get a run was hoped, but that the result would be as the game eventually ended, was beyond the wildest dreams of the Crescents—or the Winthrops.

The shoe was on the other foot. The chilly gales struck the visitors and froze them out. They had nothing to complain of but the score—the Umpire was entirely satisfactory, they said, and they were cordially entertained—but it was hard after a season of only two losses to be shut out for the first time in their existence. They did not go home until after dark.

The way the Crescents pounded Currie's speedy shoots, proved they are the people at the bat, too—except when they face their hoodoo, Mr. Harkins. But the curves of that mirthful white, Mr. Gately, were too much for the Winthrops. You never hear Patrick J. say a word about himself, but he's a mighty stem-winder just the same.

O'Rourke was in Bowers' place behind the bat, and he filled it, barring his first throw to second, well. But such an infield as backed the Crescent battery up, was never seen before in Plainfield. It was perfection. Condon, Bowman, Lee and Cadmus were a quartette of cannibals, who for an hour and forty minutes chewed up hits as though they were bits of tuttifrutti.

Saturday's game was the most satisfactory contest the city has ever witnessed. It was almost an errorless game, and the unexpected result of course added to the crowd's gratification. Only one Winthrop reached third base and only two got to second, while the Crescents were unable to steal a single bag off that remarkably fine catcher, W. Currie.

The first runs of the game were brought in by McMurray, who lined out a two-bagger when Gately and Lee were on the bases. It was a beautiful hit at just the time when it was needed and just when it began to look as if runs were impossibilities. A shout went out from the smokers' stand—"What's the matter with McMurray?" and the crowd waved the answer back till Hayden almost heard it—"He's all right."

In the "lucky seventh" that the Winthrops said would give them the lead, Daly, W. Currie and Stelbert went out in one, two, three order on little hits to short stop, pitcher and second base. But with the Crescents it was different.

Cadmus went to first on a safe one, and Hayden followed him after being hit by a Currie inshoot. McLaughlin then fell into the succotash on three strikes for the third time, and Gately flew out to J. Currie. Lee had made one two-bagger, so he was given his first on balls, and the bases were filled, with two out and no runs.

McMurray went to the bat next, and again Currie was afraid to let the striker reach the ball. Remembering the two runs that Mack had before brought in, the Winthrop's twirler thought it best to give him his first on balls and thus force in only one run. Thus the bases were still full when Bowman stepped up, and made a swipe at the first ball that was pitched him. When that ball dropped again it was in among the carriages in deep centre field, and by the time Martine had thrown it in the bases were cleared.

The score was as follows:

Middlesex Gun Club.

The next trap shooting event of national interest that will occur in the East will be the fifth annual tournament of the Middlesex Gun Club, that takes place at Dunellen, Oct. 8, 9, 10 and 11. The programme, now ready, is an attractive one, and will draw together a large number of expert marksmen from all sections of the country. The first two days will be devoted exclusively to artificial target shooting, the last two to live pigeons. The management have hung up $1,300, to be divided by classes A and B, governed by American Shooting Association rules and classification. Heretofore the Middlesex Club have had as the feature of their tournament a $1,500 guaranteed sweepstake at 100 live pigeons, $100 entrance. By special request of a large number of shooters who do not feel like entering so large an event, it will be omitted this year, and a sweepstake at 25 birds, $25 entrance, $500 guaranteed, open to the World, will be substituted. This will give all an opportunity to participate, and as the club adds all surplus receipts it will undoubtedly fill to as large an amount as the original race. The programme can be had on application to W. Fred. Quimby, 321 Broadway, New York, or W. L. Force, Plainfield.

—A peach and [illegible] festival for the benefit of the Bethel Mission church is being arranged for Thursday evening of next week.

Unusual Attractions.

The regular weekly meeting of the Reform Club this evening, promises unusual attractions in the way of recitations, readings and selected music. A hearty welcome will be given every visitor and the attendance should be large.

Building Loan.

The shareholders of the Plainfield Building and Loan Association met in Cottier's Hall, Monday evening, and paid Treasurer Codington their monthly dues with commendable promptitude. A loan in the Second Series commanded a fair premium. The Board of Directors met subsequently and transacted routine business. Every member was present, which shows a praiseworthy interest in the affairs of the association.

Not Any For Us.

Crowds of people filled with awe and morbid curiosity, gaped up at a man climbing to the top of the Trinity church spire, Saturday, expecting to see him fall.

It was George Bilyeu—commonly known as "Doc." He reached the ball on the spire, sat down on it, lifted the heavy and awkward vane off the rod at the very top of the spire, and brought it down with him in safety. He said he would rather do a climb like that, than eat.

Lost Her Bones.

A couple of wayward females from Newark, one carrying a skeleton wrapped in paper and the other a cargo of beer, wandered around the streets in this city nearly all of Monday night. One of the women entrusted the skeleton to the care of a certain person, while she made a tour through the beer bottling precincts of North Plainfield, and when she returned her package was missing. The woman recovered the package however, and left for the brewery centre on the 3:28 A. M. train.

It Was Only a Fancy.

A servant in the employ of Mr. Wm. Rockwell of East Front street, who had been imported from Elizabeth about two weeks ago, imagined that "Tom, the Peeper," was in her bedroom late on Monday night, and she announced the alleged fact to the whole neighborhood. Officers Flanagan and Glasse went to the house, but could not find even a window nor door unlocked. Nothing about the house showed any evidence that the place had been entered by burglars. The woman had evidently been dreaming.

Bound Brook Emerging From Obscurity.

(From the Chronicle.)

A story to the effect that Reinhardt Roemer, a farmer on Washington's Camp Ground, near Bound Brook, was lying in a critical condition from the effects of a bite by a copperhead snake, and naming Dr. H. R. Matthews as his attending physician, was started by the Plainfield papers last week and widely circulated by the daily journals of more distant cities. A CHRONICLER has interviewed both the doctor and the patient and they recognize the story as applying nicely to an event which occurred about fifteen years ago, in which they with the snake were the principal actors.

The probable solution to this strange reproduction as a matter of news, lies in the fact that the rapidly increasing importance of Bound Brook is now readily recognized abroad and papers at all points seize with avidity upon items relating to this vicinity, knowing that they will be read with interest. Let the good work go on, but, meanwhile, who set up the Plainfield Press with this particularly stale chestnut?

Mayor Hale Unjustly Blamed for Their Accumulation.

Under the heading, "Terrorized by Tramps—Plainfield Overrun by Them," an Elizabeth paper of Thursday says: "Tuesday afternoon Sergeant Hess and Officer Gerstung arrested John Grames, who is a brother of Peter Grames the tramp desperado arrested at Plainfield on Monday afternoon for robbery and assault on an officer in that city. They belong to a gang of tramps of the most dangerous and vicious character that have infested the city of Plainfield.

"In former years it was the practice of Mayor Hale to issue his "proclamation concerning tramps," making it obligatory on the part of the police to arrest all vagrants found within the city limits, and to have them committed to the county jail for a period not exceeding ninety days. *This year, however, the mayor has departed from his usual custom, and in consequence the fraternity of tramps is represented there in large numbers. The men have established a rendezvous along Green Brook, about a mile west of the city, where they congregate at night and revel in their drunken orgies. During the day the men go about the city, from house to house, and demand money, clothing, food and tobacco, and in case their demand is not complied with they become insulting and abusive, and terrorize the female occupants by threatening to return and burn the buildings.

"It is believed that the Grames were concerned in the Roselle outrage last week, and an effort is being made to identify them. They are trying to shift the theft at Plainfield on to another tramp known to the police as 'Burney.'"

Stealing on Coal and Freight Trains to Be Stopped.

The Central Railroad have been greatly annoyed for the past year or more by the lawless acts of tramps and gangs who have been stealing rides on trains, and if put off would cut a train in two, or place obstructions upon the track, or turn switches. Consequently the following order has been issued by Superintendent Peddle:

Special Notice to Conductors and Engineers.—Vigorous measures must be inaugurated at once to put a stop to the practice of permitting tramps and lawless characters to ride on our freight and coal trains. Before starting from initial points you will see that no such persons are on the trains and prevent them from getting on at intermediate stations. When such characters are found on your trains, whom it has been impossible to exclude, you will notify agents or night watchmen at principal points by wire, such as Junction, High Bridge, Somerville, Plainfield, Elizabeth, Elizabethport, Bergen Point and Jersey City, who will take immediate steps to have officers on hand to make arrests at such points as trains may stop.

W. H. PEDDLE, Supt.

In pursuance of this order, Detective Morris of the Central Railroad, has made arrangements with officers along the line to arrest all persons found jumping on trains, or stealing rides. A special effort will also be made to break up this practice among young boys, and habitual loungers about the stations will also receive their share of attention.

The Company is in dead earnest, and if there is such a thing as breaking up the practice, it will certainly be done.

—The petit jurors for the October term of court will be drawn at Elizabeth on Tuesday of next week.

—A young child who gave his name as Henry Whitlock was found wandering around on South Second street, Tuesday afternoon, and he was placed in the care of a lady resident on that thoroughfare, and subsequently returned to his parents.

—The cool atmosphere Tuesday did not decrease the attendance in the City Park. Late in the evening young men and women, some of the latter dressed in white, occupied seats in the park and amused themselves by talking, singing, and in various other ways.

Still Growing.

At the regular meeting of Franklin Council, No. 41, Jr. O. U. A. M., held on Thursday in the S. of T. rooms, corner of Front street and Park avenue, three members were initiated and after other routine business was transacted addresses and recitations were given, refreshments were served and a very pleasant evening was had by all the members present. The Council is in a flourishing condition and is growing very rapidly. The members will soon make some arrangements to rent and furnish a Council room of their own to meet in.

The Death of Antonio Andrews.

The funeral services took place in Brooklyn, Aug. 18, of Antonio Andrews, father of Mr. Samuel R. Andrews of 192 Broadway, this city. The former was a well known florist of Brooklyn, and died of apoplexy at his home, 283 Graham street, aged about 62 years.

He came from Spain to this country with his wife about 35 years ago. Mrs. Andrews and a family of nine children survive him. He was greatly interested and active in the formation of Brooklyn's renowned Prospect Park. His son, Mr. Samuel Andrews, of this city, has been a clerk of the Brooklyn Board of Education for many years. Numbers of the most prominent citizens of Brooklyn attended the funeral, Sunday. Interment was made in Greenwood Cemetery.

Condoling Their Brother Member.

At a special meeting of the Plainfield Bicycle club held June 24, 1889, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted and the same have been forwarded to the bereaved family:

WHEREAS, It has pleased Almighty God to remove from our midst our friend and companion, Herbert Winthrop Peck.

Resolved, That we, the members of the Plainfield Bicycle Club, desire to express to his sorrowing parents, our earnest sympathy with them in their grief, and at the same time, the sense of our own great loss. While his family is called upon to bear so sudden a bereavement, his friends are deprived of an intelligent and congenial companion, a youth full of promise, taken away at the beginning of so brilliant a career.

White Caps After Him.

"Dore" Johnson, a colored man who sleeps in a barn in the rear of Mr. Daniel Vermeule's residence on Peace street, was visited by white caps about eleven o'clock Thursday evening.

At that hour he was rudely awakened by some one battering on the roof over him. Going down stairs he found that the stove pipe which projects through the weather-boarding, had been torn down and the door leading into the yard was securely fastened from the outside. Finally he escaped from the barn through a window, and started out to borrow a revolver. He related his story to officers Flanagan and Glasse, who with a PRESS reporter returned with Mr. Johnson to his abode.

Arriving there the door was found to be braced from the outside, and about fifty yards of clothes line was also used to strengthen the work. Mr. Johnson did not lodge in his accustomed place last night.

HUNG HIMSELF TO A TREE.

Robert Clark, aged about seventy years, a farmer living on the road leading from New Providence to what is known as the "Salty Roll Hill," a few miles North of this city, committed suicide by hanging himself to a tree, near his residence, on Friday afternoon. The suicide fastened a rope around his neck, stood on a chair and threw the other end of the rope around one of the branches on a tree. He then kicked the chair from under him, and was found dangling in the air some time afterward. Life was extinct.

No direct cause is assigned for the man's rash act, but it is said that the suicide has been depressed in spirits of late. The spot Clark selected for the deed was where Father McGlynn used to address crowds of "reformed" and "unconverted" catholics and curious protestants from this city and other places in the vicinity, during many Sunday mornings of last Summer.

He Wanted the "Oven Key."

Mr. Henry Voehl, the North Plainfield baker, hired a greenhorn recently to assist about his bakery. On Wednesday evening the man was made the victim of a joke which he will not soon forget. That night he was sent to Voehl's bakery on West Front street ostensibly to get the "oven key." At the latter place he was equipped with a feed bag filled with brickbats, weighing about 50 pounds, which he was told to deliver to his employer. On the way over the man weakened under the heavy weight and sat down on the curbstone to rest. Finally he wandered on and was exhausted when he reached his destination. It is understood that the stone will be used to build an addition to the Gesang and Turner Hall on Somerset street.

To complete the joke and turn the tables, the baker who loaded the feed bag told that the greenhorn had fallen into the brook and was drowned, and the knight of the apron started out on a run and spent an hour or so hunting around under French's mill for the body. This was at 11 P. M.

He's Well Known Here.

The New York papers Friday devoted columns of space to "showing up" the dark secrets of Rev. Dr. Adolph Schabehorn, of Charlestown, N. Y., who has run away from his family and his debts and left The Spellbinder Company, of New York city, without a manager. The household goods left in possession of his wife and nine children have been levied upon to pay his debts.

In conversation with a newspaper man a day or two since, Mrs. Schabehorn, who by the way is a sister of Mrs. Geo. Kessiring, of North Plainfield, said: "Dr. Schabehorn was born in Germany sixty years ago. He is a handsome man and a fine scholar. I lived in Plainfield, N. J., and married him twenty-two years ago. We lived first in New York. Then my husband became pastor of the Lutheran church in Plainfield. Then he got the Western fever and we moved to Campville, Ill., where he had a Lutheran church. From there he went to St. Louis, where he edited a monthly paper called the Free Pulpit, and he was later on connected with other newspaper enterprises."

Dr. Schabehorn will be remembered by many as having addressed a Republican mass meeting in the old Casino skating rink on Grove street here, during the Blaine campaign in 1884. The doctor, it is also alleged, eloped with the funds belonging to a church at Nyack, N. Y., a few years ago.

—Saturday will be another of the salt water days at Florida Grove and Boynton Beach.

Butchers at Base Ball.

The Butchers' nine from this city that will play the Grocers on Labor Day at Boynton Beach, will include, Will Smalley, Ern Townley, Jas. Carty, Al. Smalley, Newt. Smalley, Ed. Munday, Hayes Reynolds, Jesse Heath and Ed. Hand.

(From the New Brunswick Fredonian.)

Plainfield has increased in population from a little over 8,000 in 1870 to about 13,000, and in the same time its valuations for purposes of taxation have almost doubled. The western towns will do well to look to their laurels, if the increase continues at this rate.

The Taxes in North Plainfield Township.

Assessor Brokaw has been notified to levy taxes to the amount of $1,000 for the filling of washouts in North Plainfield Township outside of the Borough, also $2,000 for Township purposes, and $7,000 for interest and the sinking fund.

Too Much Noise.

In spite of Supt. Olhausen's order, there is still too much loud and unnecessary shrieking of the locomotives through the inhabited parts of our city. Especially is the nuisance great during the early hours of the morning between the Grant Avenue and main stations.

W. C. T. U. Meetings.

Saturday evening, prayer and praise at 8 o'clock; Sunday at 9.45 A. M., and 4 P. M.; also a "Mothers' meeting" on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The subject to be considered this week is one of great importance, as touching the welfare of the boys and girls of Plainfield. The meetings are held in the W. C. T. U. rooms, 73 West Front street, and are open to all.

Fast Driving.

Complaint is made of the reckless manner in which some of the coachmen and others in this city drive around corners, making it unsafe for pedestrians. Owners of horses and their drivers should remember that at all times people on foot have the right of way, and interfering with this privilege is a direct violation of the city ordinance. A word to the wise should be sufficient.

Those Delinquent Taxes.

Thus far during the present month, Justice V. W. Nash has collected about $1,500 of the delinquent taxes, making a total of about $5,500 which has been collected by the delinquent tax collector since he was appointed.

One obstreperous delinquent Tuesday refused point blank to pay up his taxes, but when told that unless he settled the county jail would be his future abiding place, he made arrangements to cancel the debt.

The City of Paris Lowers the Ocean Record Again.

Mr. F. G. Neighbor, of this city, arrived from Europe this morning on the City of Paris, making the trip in 5 days, 19 hours and 18 minutes from Queenstown to Sandy Hook lightship. This lowers the fastest ocean record, already held by the same steamer, just four hours.

Others on the City of Paris were Miss Wilson, daughter of Mr. John F. Wilson of North Plainfield, Prince Russell Harrison and sister, Edw. Gould, Mary Anderson and And. J. Carnegie. The steamer arrived at Sandy Hook at 4:30 o'clock Wednesday morning.

Miss Fliege Sails for Germany.

Miss Fliege, the German lady, who has been an unwilling charge upon this place for several weeks, has sailed for home. A large number of persons, aggregating something like 200, have been contributors to the fund raised in her behalf. The subscriptions ran all the way from ten cents to ten dollars, and amounted to a total of $200, exclusive of the cost of the ticket to Hamburg. This was procured by Mr. Otto Arens, of Park avenue, independently of the Plainfield fund. As this large hearted gentleman never does anything by halves, he was determined to secure the very best comfort the steamer could afford; which he did. The money will be deposited in trust with a Bremen lawyer, a nephew of Mr. Arens, subject to the order of Miss Fliege. The lady expressed heart-felt gratitude for all that the generous people of the place did for her, and will acknowledge the kindness in a more formal way when she gets into the quiet surroundings of her life at home. Those who became well acquainted with the unfortunate found her to be a person of marked refinement and culture.

SHOT HIMSELF IN A DELIRIUM.

The city of Bridgeton, N. J., was greatly shocked early Thursday morning on learning that Dr. Henry C. Fithian, a native of that place, and for nine years a practising physician of Port Norris, had committed suicide.

Dr. Fithian was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1877 and at once settled at Scotch Plains. There he built up a large and lucrative practice and in two and a half years married Miss Lillie Ritchie, a daughter of James Ritchie, who has since then been the postmaster of that village. Soon afterwards he removed to his native county and settled at Port Norris, where for nine years he has been one of the most prominent citizens.

He was an ardent sportsman and for the past week has been off shooting in Cape May County. He returned home late night of Aug. 26, and was suffering terribly from inflammation of the stomach. The next day he was delirious at times and in a lucid interval he told his young wife that unless he was better within two days he would die. He then wrote out directions as to what should be done with his property and affairs.

The next night he became delirious, but about 4 o'clock the next morning sunk into a quiet sleep, supposedly. His wife then took a nap, but had scarcely got asleep when a shot awakened her, and starting up she found that her husband had a revolver in his hands. She tried to wrest it from him, crying:

"You will shoot yourself."

"I have already done so," he quietly answered. "I have shot myself through the heart," and in another instant he fired a shot through his brain and fell over dead.

The doctor had been ill for several months and it is thought his mind had become seriously impaired with hard work and worry, added to his poor health. His only child, an infant, died a few months ago.

*Dr. Fithian was considered a remark*ably bright and intelligent physician and hard student. His father, Joel Fithian, of Bridgeton, is almost distracted over the death of this, his only child.

At Scotch Plains Friday, a PRESS reporter learned that Mrs. Fithian's parents received a telegram yesterday at 10 A. M., merely announcing the death. Mrs. Ritchie started at once for Port Norris in entire ignorance of the cause of death which she supposed to be the result of the Doctor's recent illness.

Mrs. Fithian's marriage to the doctor on Feb. 24, 1880, will be remembered as occasioning much surprise and gossip. He located in Scotch Plains in 1876, possessing [illegible]

Fleeing Jackson's Health.

It is stated that the health of John Jackson, of firebug fame, who is serving out a fifteen-year sentence in State Prison for numerous acts of incendiarism committed in this city, is rapidly on the decline, and that his complaint is bordering on consumption. Jackson has been compelled to quit work and is now confined to his bed, and those who have seen him lately declare that he will never emerge from the prison walls alive.

Sending Oil to a New Station.

Mr. J. E. Morse, of Franklin place, who is a civil engineer and surveyor for the Standard Oil Company, has gone to Changewater, about two miles from Hampton Junction, N. J., to lay out the ground for a new brick pumping station for the Tidewater Oil Company. At present the oil is being pumped 164 miles to the company's tanks at Bergen Point, but when the new station is at work the distance will be reduced one-half.

Muzzle or Shoot the Dogs.

The number of dogs running loose in our streets, is a nuisance and a danger. Already two or three dogs have gone mad, and it is almost a wonder that no persons have been bitten. The law requiring that dogs be muzzled should be rigidly enforced. There ought also to be some ordinance which should compel owners of dogs to keep them in places where their constant barking will not make night hideous for those who would like to sleep.

A Narrow Escape.

While returning from Boynton Beach Thursday, a stage load of excursionists, composed mainly of the guests of Force's Hotel had a narrow escape from serious injury. The party passed the day pleasantly at the beach, and the trip home was uneventful until the corner of Park avenue and Fourth street was reached. At this point the stage ran upon a heap of gravel which had been taken from a cellar, deposited in the roadway, and left there without the regulation danger signal. The stage narrowly escaped overturning and the occupants were thoroughly frightened.

There is a city ordinance which relates to obstructions in the streets, and provides for the punishment of those who fail to display the proper danger signal at night.

MAY HAPPEN PLAINFIELD.

The city water supply of *New Bruns*wick is so bad that at a recent meeting of the Board of Health it was deemed advisable to instruct the citizens to boil the water before using. The city draws its water supply from Lawrence's Brook, a small stream about two miles from the town. The stream is dammed up at Weston's Mills, and pumped into a reservoir on the outskirts of the city. The brook is overgrown with water lilies and weeds, and the farmers' cows and pigs roam through it. The water has got so bad of late that it flavors the tea and coffee in a most disagreeable way. Well water is in great demand, and people carry it for blocks. There are but few wells in the lower part of the city, however, as most of them were closed up by order of the Board of Health on the ground that they were contaminated by the under drainage from the graveyard.

Bishop Vincent, Dr. Hurlbut and Miss Kimball Take Part.

Recognition day, which is the Chautauquan means the great day of the season, and to the barbarian means graduating day for the class of '89 of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, arrived on Wednesday of last week.

The weather was clear and cool, the crowds immense, the Hall of Philosophy and the Amphitheatre were elaborately decorated with flowers, the former's classic outlines and beauty supplemented for the day by busts of Socrates, Plato, Goethe and Shakespeare. The woodwork was hidden by festoons of evergreens, bands of flowers and class and circle mottos.

At 8 o'clock the procession began to form, and from then until 11, when the exercises in the Amphitheatre began, the marching and countermarching, the strewing of flowers, the passing through the mysterious symbolic arches in the hall in the grove, the "Recognition" in the Hall of Philosophy, the class and Chautauqua songs, the gaiety of the throng, the gravity of the graduates and officials, made a kaleidoscopic picture never to be forgotten.

Reaching the Amphitheatre, public exercises of recognition were led by Principal J. L. Hurlbut. The Rev. David Swing, of Chicago, then gave an address to the graduates on "The Beautiful and the Useful."

In the afternoon President Lewis Miller delivered a salutation; Miss Kate F. Kimball, Secretary of the C. L. S. C., read her annual report of the work of the Circle for the past year; letters from absent councilors were read, and diplomas were presented to over four hundred and fifty "Argonauts" of the class of '89 by Chancellor Vincent and Principal Hurlbut.

These graduates represent men and women of all ages, in all the walks of life, from all parts of the land. The broker from Pasadena, Cal., passed through the arches side by side with a tailor from Concord, N. H., while a housekeeper from Fairbault, Minn., was declared a member of "The Society of the Hall in the Grove" at the same time with a pastor's wife from Louisville, Ky.

New Jersey furnished the following graduates: Miss Annie R. Wells, Englewood; Misses F. and S. Steele, and M. V. Cowles, of Newark; Miss Mary F. Freeman, Westfield.

Representatives of the Standard Oil Company telegraphed Bishop Vincent Tuesday demanding the right to have a champion of "Trusts" appear there and *reply to Dr. Washington Gladden's on*slaught. Bishop Vincent replied: "Send on your man." Probably Mr. James McGee, of North Plainfield, will be the one.

Sufferers from indigestion, loss of appetite, *liver or kidney complaints, rheum*atism or neuralgia, would do well to give Ayer's Sarsaparilla a trial. For all such disorders, no medicine is so effective as this, when faithfully and perseveringly used.

CONSUMPTION,

IN its first stages, can be successfully checked by the prompt use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Even in the later periods of that disease, the cough is wonderfully relieved by this medicine.

"I have used Ayer's Cherry Pectoral with the best effect in my practice. This wonderful preparation once saved my life. I had a constant cough, night sweats, was greatly reduced in flesh, and given up by my physician. One bottle and a half of the Pectoral cured me."—A. J. Eidson, M. D., Middleton, Tennessee.

"Several years ago I was severely ill. The doctors said I was in consumption, and that they could do nothing for me, but advised me, as a last resort, to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. After taking this medicine two or three months I was cured, and my health remains good to the present day."—James Birchard, Darien, Conn.

"Several years ago, on a passage home from California, by water, I contracted so severe a cold that for some days I was confined to my state-room, and a physician on board considered my life in danger. Happening to have a bottle of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, I used it freely, and my lungs were soon restored to a healthy condition. Since then I have invariably recommended this preparation."—J. B. Chandler, Junction, Va.

PLAINFIELD GETS HERS.

The Union County Board of Freeholders Tuesday awarded the contracts for building the four new and elegant drives that are to make the county the envy of the State and the pride of its people.

The contract for constructing the road from Rahway to Elizabeth was awarded to R. M. & J. F. Shanley, of Newark. Their bid was $43,000.

The road from Elizabeth through Union Township to Springfield was awarded to Contractor Bernard Mahon of Seventh avenue, New York, his bid being $55,000. Mahon also captured the contract for building the road from Elizabeth through Roselle, Cranford, Westfield and Fanwood townships to Plainfield for $22,184.

Contractor H. G. Wood of New York, was the lowest bidder for constructing the cross-country road from Fanwood to the Westfield line, his bid being $17,000.

The entire cost of the four roads will be $139,000. The Freeholders have issued bonds to the amount of $150,000 bearing 4½ per cent. interest to pay for the improvements, which must be completed in two years.

The lowest bids amounted in the aggregate to $235,000, as follows: Morris avenue—from Elizabeth to Springfield, Summit and New Providence—$106,256; Westfield or South avenue—from Elizabeth to Plainfield—$86,000; St. George avenue—from Elizabeth to Rahway—$42,700. The Board, however, had only $150,000 for the purpose and divided it in this way:

St. George avenue will be entirely completed at the price stated above. The balance of the fund will be equally divided on the other two avenues. Work on South avenue to begin at Plainfield and continue until the appropriation is exhausted; and on Morris avenue work will begin at Elizabeth and continue to Summit or as long as that appropriation lasts.

Director Hubbard and Freeholder Vanderbeek had a hard fight for Plainfield's end of the roads, and only succeeded in getting what they demanded, by a majority of one vote.

Some unknown boy accidentally broke one of the large plate-glass windows in the City National Bank building on East Front street, Thursday, and scampered off without leaving any clew whereby his identity might be established. Officer Mattox was detailed to watch in front of the building during the night.

The young man whom Mr. H. C. Drake accuses of striking him with a butcher's cleaver in a West Front street butcher shop, on Wednesday evening, claims that he was not to blame. He says that Mr. Drake was fooling with him when the accident occurred, and that he is in no way responsible for the injuries received.

Imprisonment for Delinquent Taxes.

The first arrest of a delinquent taxpayer was made Aug. 21. He was a colored man in arrears for poll tax, and he was locked up in the city jail. Subsequently he made arrangements to settle. Shamed by Her Father's Deeds.

A despatch from Clarkstown, N. Y., to a New York morning paper says: "'Shabbyhorn' is the name now given by people here to the fugitive 'Spellbinder' and preacher, Adolph Schabehorn, of whom no tidings have been received. His oldest daughter, aged nineteen, who has been living for a year with her mother's people at Plainfield, N. J., had a sad return home yesterday. She was gazed at by every eye on the train and as she reached this place she broke down and left the railway station in tears."

Hit With a Butcher's Cleaver.

Mr. Henry C. Drake, proprietor of the American Steam Laundry on East Front street, was walking along that thoroughfare night Aug. 21, on his way to Coriell's butcher shop, when two boys named Demens, each carrying a club, came up behind him, and in passing Mr. Drake one of the clubs accidentally struck the latter on the hat. Mr. Drake took hold of the club, whereupon one of the boys threatened to strike him with it.

Reaching the meat market Mr. Drake went inside, followed by the boys, one of whom picked up a butcher's cleaver and deliberately struck him on the left hand, nearly severing the first finger. The boy will probably be arrested for his freshness.

SPREADING THEIR FAME AND FLIGHTS.

Last Friday's Evening Transcript of Birmingham, Conn., says: "A carrier pigeon was released at 8:05 o'clock this morning from Miller's art gallery by C. H. Hinkley, Mr. Miller's artist. The bird went to J. Hervey Doane, Plainfield, N. J. Two birds were released at Philadelphia, Thursday, for the same destination, and will be heard from to-morrow probably. Mr. Hinkley is quite a bird fancier himself and he and Mr. Doane own about 50 carrier pigeons. The bird which he let go this morning he estimated would cover the distance of 90 miles in two hours.

"The bird carried a message attached to one leg which was fastened by a simple but effective contrivance invented by Mr. Doane. The message is written on very thin paper, which if closely written will contain 500 words. This is rolled up in waterproof paper and is wound around with a copper wire. This long roll is made stiff by the wire, bent around the pigeon's leg and the two ends of the wire fastened. This method is somewhat better than the one commonly used which is to attach the message to the bird's wing as in that case the bird sometimes stops to pick off the message, thus losing time, if not the message itself.

"Mr. Hinkey says the Plainfield Press uses the carrier pigeons to transfer news at short distances from the city, and finds them equal to the telegraph with the ordinary messenger boy combined, for quick transmission, and far more economical. Hinkey and Doane use the birds for sport principally, and find them very interesting. It is not all sport, however, as but a small proportion of the birds raised prove to be reliable carriers. Out of a loft of 80 pigeons, probably not more than a dozen will prove of any use. Many are lost on being first released, while others will make several trips all right and will then finally disappear.

Death of Mrs. Mary T. Smith.

The death is announced of Mrs. Mary T. Smith, which occurred at her home, 141 Broadway, Tuesday after a lingering illness from consumption. She had been in delicate health for a long time past, and during the recent flood it was found necessary to carry her from her house to another.

The funeral will take place from the house today at 5 P. M.

Fell and Broke the Lamp.

While the family of Special Officer Mattox were seated around a table at their home on Park avenue, about 9:30 o'clock on Wednesday evening, a framed picture of Kate Claxton and Mr. Charles Stevenson, which was suspended from the wall, fell directly on a lamp, fanned out the light and broke the lamp and chimney into fragments. Several vases were also knocked over and broken.

Boy Choir at Reform Hall.

The last mid-week meeting in Reform Hall betokened increased interest in the cause of temperance as there boldly espoused. Appropriate remarks were made by several ladies and gentlemen, and an exceedingly pleasant feature of the occasion was a choir of boys, ably and kindly tutored by Mrs. John King, who expects soon to enlist additional numbers. These Thursday evening meetings will be regularly held and open to all.

Sunstroke.

James Sheridan, of this city, was prostrated by the heat while at work in Hillside cemetery, Thursday. He was one of the laborers employed in the pit from which the gravel is taken and spread upon the cemetery roads.

Shortly after resuming work in the afternoon, he was so overcome by the intense heat that with assistance he was taken to his home in this city. He has since entirely recovered.

A Gorgeous Bazaar.

The coming Rainbow Fair to be held at The Crescent, under the auspices of the ladies of All Saints Episcopal church, of Fanwood, promises to be a very attractive show. Half the building will be devoted to a realistic Gypsy encampment. There will be various booths with the ladies all in costume. In addition to the many lovely sights to be seen there will be an excellent concert each evening, which alone will be worth a visit to the affair.

Only Short Rates for the Women.

The report of the State School Superintendent shows that there are 1,615 public school houses in the State, an increase of five over last year. Thirty new buildings were erected during the year. The total value of the property of the State is $7,-877,766. The average value of the school-houses is $5,000.

There is a total of 4,431 teachers employed in the schools. Of this number 796 are men. The average salary paid to the men is $67.24 a month, while the average salary for women is $42.35 a month.

Base Hits.

Saturday's game with the West Ends will be called at 3:30 o'clock.

The Trenton team that is to play the Crescents again, Labor Day afternoon, defeated the Princeton team Saturday by a score of 25 to 9.

Next Monday morning the Crescents will cross bats with the Hackett-Carharts of New York. It will no doubt be a very interesting game, as the visiting team has signed Esterbrook, of this year's Indianapolis team and several other professional players.

President French and Miss Ferris Speak for Temperance.

There was a grand demonstration in Reform Hall Sunday night, the audience room being nearly full. The presiding officer's chair was filled by Vice President Harper, Mr. Cleaver conducted the devotional services, and Mr. Vanderbeek's full choir rendered the best of music. On the platform, in company with Miss Ferris, were seated several lady champions of temperance—namely: Mrs. G. F. Opdyke, Mrs. F. M. French, Mrs. J. B. Cleaver, Mrs. G. M. Appleman and Mrs. S. W. F. Randolph.

The first speaker was President John M. French, who earnestly advocated the signing of the pledge as a duty incumbent upon all, and especially the young men. Mr. French acknowledged his own personal lack of fidelity in the face of temptation, but avowed his renewed allegiance to total abstinence, and that he would stand by the Reform Club as a noble institution and with increased zeal labor in behalf of the good cause it represents.

Following Mr. French, the Vice President introduced Miss Kitty Ferris of New York, who recited in first-class style a production of the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage against high license. Miss Ferris was warmly received, her elocution being perfect and her manner very pleasing. The general wish was that she would appear again. Mr. Cleaver closed with a few appropriate remarks, and upon offering the pledge for signatures, several came forward and did as Mr. Cleaver had suggested—resolved bravely and himself take "a prohibition party of one." With the benediction the large and interesting meeting terminated.

Amos H. Van Horn Tendered a [illegible] Reception.

The residence of Amos H. Van Horn, 573 Warren street, Newark, was the scene of an exceedingly pleasant affair the other night. Mr. Van Horn recently returned from an European trip, and his employes, twenty-six in number, in a quiet and surreptitious manner completed preparations for tendering a formal reception to him. In the afternoon a committee visited Mr. Van Horn's home and assisted in decorating the parlor with floral designs.

About 8 o'clock the employes waited upon Mr. Van Horn and made their intentions known. Charles E. Dean, on behalf of his fellows, delivered a short address of welcome, and in a supplemental speech presented Mr. Van Horn with a gold-headed umbrella. Mr. Van Horn replied in a happy vein and prepared a bounteous collation for his visitors.

Previous to the presentation of the umbrella the employes celebrated Mr. Van Horn's return by a display of fireworks in front of the house, lasting for half an hour. The festivities concluded at midnight.

CONVERTED TO HIGH LICENSE.

James A. Bradley, founder of Asbury Park, publishes a letter in a local paper Saturday in which occur some statements that have caused a sensation in the stronghold of temperance. Mr. Bradley says:

"License to sell intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage is a relict of barbarism and excites my contempt, which contempt would be felt if I had almighty power; but as I am only a single individual making up a State of over a million population, the majority of whom will not concede anything higher than high license at the present time, I accept the best for the present. * * * As matters are now in the Park the fight is too big for your humble servant. Good men come to me and whisper that they think liquor is sold in certain places, and suggest that if any action is taken their names must not be mentioned; but beyond this very little help is afforded, and I am ashamed to say I believe if some fellow in Asbury Park had a $500 or a $1,000 license to sell rum he would give me more information and the kind of evidence that would convict the druggists than we now get from the easy-going temperance people of Asbury Park."

A Word or Two With an Esteemed Contemporary.

The Union County Standard, in a labored editorial republished in THE PRESS of Saturday, admits, substantially, our charge that Westfield is in the soup.

"It has a high grade of scholarship in the graduating class, last Summer" the editor says. Indeed! Who said anything to the contrary? What we referred to by the term "school facilities" was not intended to reflect on the talent of the youth of that town, nor their acquirements. Don't dodge the question, Mr. Editor of the Standard, but meet it squarely. We meant that Westfield has been a year or more trying to get a first class High School building; and that that effort has not yet materialized.

"A superior site has been selected," the editor of the Standard goes on to state. "Selected site" is evasive, unless it is meant that your district has purchased and is the proprietor of that "superior site." What are the facts, Mr. Editor? Does the School District own the "superior site," or is the title of that part of "Mount Ararat" still in Mr. Ripley? Who owns the plans of the new High School Building—School District No. 10 of Westfield, or Architect Teal of this city?

"The way to resume payment," said the sage of the New York Tribune, the late Horace Greeley, "is to resume." The way to get a "superior site" for a High School is to purchase it. The way to get a school building like such building as we have in Plainfield, is to have the architect's plans executed by mechanics. That is the way we do in Plainfield, and then we do our blowing afterwards. "Put up or shut up" was the laconic utterance of the late (now St.) John Morrissey.

We say this in all kindness, "good naturedly," as we are credited in the Standard with speaking before; and would add that our good friend the able editor of the Standard has done his part to promote the building and equipment of a first rate high school building in Westfield, and it is no fault of his that the thing has not been done. Westfield will probably heed the example of some of her neighbors, shortly, and go ahead and actually furnish "public school facilities." If it doesn't do something of the kind and pretty soon, worthy of itself, and of its "topographical" importance as claimed by the Standard, it will not lie in its mouth to claim that superiority it is so wont to claim.

For Hay Fever.

"Give Ely's Cream Balm a trial. This justly celebrated remedy for the cure of catarrh, hay fever, cold in the head, &c., can be obtained of any reputable druggist, and may be relied upon as a safe and pleasant remedy for the above complaints and will give immediate relief. It is not a liquid snuff or powder, has no offensive odor and can be used at any time with good results, as thousands can testify, among them some of the attaches of this office."—Spirit of the Times.

THREE KINDS!

I know
The past, and thence I will essay to glean
A warning for the future, so that man
May profit by his errors, and derive
Experience from his folly.—SHELLEY.

Then comes the thoughtless man, who wends his way to the fashionable tailor, gets a good suit, but pays a very big price for the same.

The wise man deals with some reputable manufacturer of Clothing and secures garments fully equal to those made to order at about half custom prices. Thus the wise man gets his Clothing, with quality and workmanship thrown in, as cheap as the foolish man his miserable trash. An unusually large number of wise men are being attracted to our store this Spring. Whether it's a case of "once bitten twice shy" or not, we don't know, but certainly their patronage of does credit to their good judgment, and we don't think, once having traded here they'll be caught by clap-trap again. We know what we sell. We make it, and neither time, effort or money is spared to produce garments that will do us credit and still further establish our reputation. It's a selfish interest we take, we'll admit, but the effect is the same. It's there, and it pays both you and us.

WEE LORDS AND LADIES

How to Dress the Youngsters for the Beach Sands and for the Children's Dances of Gay Summer Evenings—Gowns for All Ages and Occasions.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

It is not the least debt we owe to the midsummer holidays that they give us back our buttercups again. It is hard to identify the pale, silent little school girl of town with the vivid chattering buttercup who instead of saying:

"Twinkle, twinkle little star,
I don't wonder what you are;
You are evanescent gases,

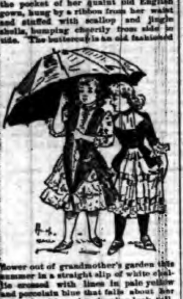
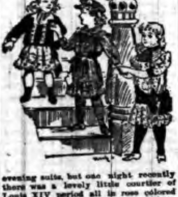
like the learned [illegible]'s girl in Dr. Newman's sermon, scampers over the sands, the pocket of her quaint old English gown, hung by a ribbon from her waist and stuffed with scallop and jingle shells, bumping cheerily from side to side. The buttercup is an old fashioned flower out of grandmother's garden this summer in a straight slip of white challie crossed with lines in pale yellow and porcelain blue that falls about her fair and softly and makes her look tall. The short, low-necked waist is laced across in front with blue silk cord like a peasant's bodice, and the daintiest handkerchief of white embroidered mull is folded about the shoulders and tucked, instead of the baby guimpe, inside the lacings. The petticoat under the gathered skirt is guiltless of starch and it drops close about the childish figure as if it had been copied from the frock of some sweet-faced Kentish lassie who picked daises two hundred years ago. On the small girl's head is a white muslin hat with a frilled lace border, a blue ribbon tied about it and a full soft crown. The shoes are yellow and the stockings are blue, just the shade of the blue in the gown, though under the colored hose you may be sure her mother has put a pair of white or cream lisle thread or gauze ones. The small girls gown is shorter waisted and shorter in the skirt than she wore a year ago. If she is three years old it no longer touches those yellow canvas ties. If she is four or five years older it comes nearly to her boot tops, and her big sister of fifteen has adopted dresses as long as those worn by the full grown woman.



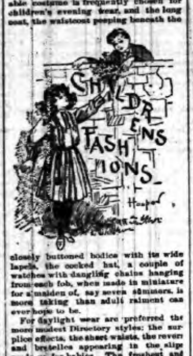
This is Jeannette. As for Jean, his sailor dress suits him perfectly. It gives him a saucy and decided air which it is a pleasure to see. His blue and white striped shirt peeps out between the points of his rolling collar and completes the effect of his white duck man-o'-war blouse and his long white baggy breeches, which—though he is hardly big enough to be out of kilts—leave half-moon marks in the sand. There is a blue anchor on the front of his sailor cap, and a boatswain's pipe hangs about his neck by a lanyard. If he does not look like a General, which is his great wish, at least he looks like an Admiral. Meanwhile he proposes to shovel sand into his pail. If the small boy is under five and still in petticoats his kilts reach scarcely to the knees. His short white stockings come one inch, perhaps, above the ankles, and the bare red-brown legs are put through as many antics as if they belonged to a frisky calf.

The first hour in the ball room at the hops at Narragansett Pier is given to the children, and the little revellers dance with a grace and abandon not often attained by beaux and belles of a mature age, their bows and their courtesies, their smiles and their coquetries exhibiting the children's carnival in its greatest glory and brilliancy. The boys, most of them, wear simple, neat evening suits, but one night recently there was a lovely little courtier of Louis XIV period all in rose colored velvet and satin and rose colored silk hose and golden curls arranged in a style that would have tickled the fancy of a Marquis of the court of the Grande Monarque. Every dance night brings out, of course, a new Fauntleroy, and the little lords in white serge vie with those in black velvet coats and knee breeches, buckle shoes, silk stockings and floating hair falling in a cloud over point lace or point coupe collars; while all turn to gaze on the Olive Homan's dress, as one may call it in contradistinction from those worn in the part by Elsie Leslie or the little Russell, a deep rich shade of blue velvet—the real royal blue with lace collars and cuffs and a big white sash with a bow that almost overpowers the blonde boy wearer.



Silk and silk gauze, sheeny satin and tulle, soft sashes, floating ribbons flowers and tinsel, jewels and their imitations, twinkling feet in pretty boots and slippers worn with silk stockings to match the color of the gown; showers of blonde, brown and golden hair tossing over white necks and arms and around rosy faces; low square-cut Josephine waists, short and made to look shorter with broad belts or sling sashes, these make up what is supplied by the little girls toward the ensemble of the pretty kaleidoscope of color. Even children follow in evening dress the prevailing fashions of the moment hence reproductions of the child portraits which Reynold's, Gainsborough and Vandyck drew are among the most successful summer costumes, borrowing the peculiar charm of quaintness from the raiment of other days. Edwin Booth's grandchildren with one or two little people visiting them were the successes of an evening recently, dressed after Vandyck's picture of the children of Charles I. in the Berlin gallery. There were three little girls in gowns of soft China silk, pale yellow, peach and lime green respectively. Each little dress was made with a long skirt coming to the ankles and sewn to the waist in pleats. About each dimpled neck was a collar of the lace which owes its name to the master who painted the long points. The sleeves were puffed to the wrists and finished with lace cuffs. Full wide aprons were worn and close skull caps of lace fitted down over the fuzzy curls. The boy wore a close habit and breeches of white satin braided in silver and trimmed with point lace with slashed sleeves and deep collar and long curling hair of a period when the male garb was in its most picturesque estate.

The six-year-old daughter of a rich somebody from Brooklyn made a winsome Daisy in a gown of white crepe de chine, whose edges were embroidered with her "wee, modest, crimson tipped" name flower. Her necklace was woven of genuine field daisies strung together by the stalks, making a daisy chain, and her long yellow hair was crowned by a cap of the Tam O'Shanter order with a green tassel in the middle and loops of ribbon carried round like daisy petals. The simple white muslin gown, with its low rounded neck and elbow sleeves bordered with ruched ribbon matching in color the sash about the short waist which Gainsborough has so often painted, makes a dress which somehow seems more appropriate to the wear of the dear little folks than the silks, be they ever so soft and fine. The Incroyable costume is frequently chosen for children's evening wear, and the long coat, the waistcoat peeping beneath the closely buttoned bodice with its wide lapels, the cocked hat, a couple of watches with dangling chains hanging from each fob, when made in miniature for a maiden of, say seven summers, is more taking than adult raiment can ever hope to be.



For daylight wear are preferred the more modest Directory styles: the surplice effects, the short waists, the revers and bretelles appearing in the slips made up for babies. The freshest and daintiest of the little people's dresses this season are the white embroidered mulls. The pretty blonde damsel who went tripping past my window this morning would be worth a second glance anywhere. Her little skirt was one embroidered flounce, and the low-necked waist of embroidery was worn over a guimpe of plain mull gathered full at the throat in Marguerite fashion. Narrow white ribbon gave just the finish needed. Next the mulls and far more generally useful are the exquisite wool challies. A pretty little dress in white and pale yellow challies strewn with flower sprays in shaded greens and blues is made with a low neck and no sleeves, to wear with fine guimpes of India mull or white cashmere. The sleeves are full and gathered at the wrist into a cuff, and the full skirt and challie sash have the hems feather stitched, which supplies the trimming. The veilings and batistes and ginghams, the nainsooks and cambrics, the infinite variety of pretty stuffs which are the staple wear of the everyday, commonplace, sweet, wholesome American small girls, were never so tasteful as now. The colors in these fabrics offer new tints which blend charmingly with embroideries, laces and ribbons. A simple little blue and gray gingham has the round neck and elbow sleeves trimmed with white embroidered mull ruffles, with rosettes of white ribbon on either shoulder. The lace-striped ginghams often have the hem of the skirt turned up on the outside, and finished with a white cord. Nainsook is the wee girls' fabric, cambric belongs to the petticoated boy. One distinguishes between them as to material even in infancy. The boybaby's cambric or pique frock has a box-plaited waist, gathered skirt and belt with turn-over collar, feather stitched in pink or blue, where the girl baby wears a guimpe under a low-necked round waist made entirely of hemstitched tucks with a nainsook sash tied in huge bow. The hemstitching is often very elaborate and quantities of narrow Valenciennes lace are used for trimming.

Not everybody is out of town, even in the height of the midsummer vacation. I see several human beings as I go and come about the streets. "Oh, yes," says some worshipper (from afar) of the 400, "but nobody that is anybody." Quite the contrary. I happen during the past week to have brushed against several people who on various occasions have justified their right to live and to have their names in the papers. Miss Grace H. Dodge, one of the women School Commissioners, made a pleasant picture on the streets of New York the other day. Tall and fair, with chestnut hair and a fresh English complexion, she is a good example of a wealthy young woman who spends a great part of her summer in town. Then there was Mrs. Mackay, the wife of the bonanza king, who in cream white India silk morning gown, with pearls in her ears, stretched out her tiny black satin slippers and declared that New York was as good a summer resort as one could find. Mrs. Maud Howe Elliott, Julia Ward Howe's daughter, who is almost as beautiful now as she was in 1876, when Porter painted his celebrated picture of her, can't quite confine herself to Newport when New York publishers are to be dealt with. But after all the chief excitement of city life in August centres about the whistle of the postman.

FROM A CAMPER ON ONE OF THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.—"The houseboat bids fair to become a distinctive feature of our scenery. Four or five wealthy Canadian families are summering in these delightful floating cottages. They are ranged close to the shore over against two of the prettiest Canadian islands and form quite a social colony, where afternoon teas are given, visits made in fast-flying canoes, with now and then a moonlight concert, a dance or supper and about all a sense of romance and glorious freedom. When you get tired of the rocky shores overhung with trees about your houseboat, all you have to do is to up anchors and shove yourself along with poles to a fresh abiding place, or if a more ambitious move is desired you call a launch or a tug and steam away to another island. Yesterday afternoon was a fete day and we were almost as gay as at Henley on the Thames. Our Canadian friends enter with the utmost heartiness into everything. The houseboats were decorated with bright flags and huge parasols of flowers. There were flowers everywhere. Huge earthenware vases and blue china jars were ranged along decks and golden rod and wild scarlet hollyhocks and cardinal flowers bloomed in profusion, clematis vines with their white and feathery seeds clambering from drawbridge to awning. Light cedar canoes glided from island to island and dozens of rowboats danced on the waters. There were tennis games and cricket on a convenient meadow, and these Northern girls looked more blithesome even than during the winter carnival in their silk blouses of lilac, pale yellow, scarlet and blue, with white glazed sailor hats, baseball and Eton caps, soft round felts and broad brimmed head fixings of every description. Sometimes a whole boatload wore the same colors. A six-oared barge was manned by half a dozen damsels in yellow and black, who made a picturesque crew. But if you want to fall a victim to the swig witchery you should see a handsome Canadian girl paddle a canoe. The houseboat in which we are visiting is not by any means a mere drifting raft. It is a regular two-story house built on a barge, with lace curtains at its windows and ten rooms inside. It has a flat roof where we strew rugs and cushions and lie in steamer chairs and hammocks under a gay striped awning. It hasn't as many gables as a Queen Anne cottage, indeed, truth compels the admission that it is rectangular in shape and suggests a packing box floating, but it is painted in reds and cool greens and looks very gay of an evening with rows of Japanese lanterns hanging from beam to beam. It has a good expanse deck fore and aft where are more awnings and hammocks and easy chairs, and where we have morning glories and nasturtiums and scarlet runners growing in flower boxes. There is a bathroom upstairs, but if you want a really good plunge of course you take a header out of the window. We haven't a piano but our next boat neighbor has, and the music goes very well with our violin. There is plenty of room for entertaining guests, and when the stars come out and the drawbridge is pulled up we light a fire on the open hearth, if the air is chilly, and feel as much cut off from the world as a feudal baron in his castle. Next week we are planning to tie two or even three houseboats together and go off for a week's drifting in company. The girls will wear Henley shirts and the men broad-striped flannels, and if singing and sketching and boating do not fill up the period, why we will have a naval battle of flowers."

FROM A NEWPORT BUTTERFLY.—"The yachting gowns are the prettiest things here to my thinking. The Electra, a superb steam yacht, is one of the finest boats in the fleet, and clad in one of the most picturesque water suits, with jaunty sailor hats, troops of gay girls board the pretty craft to enjoy the impromptu dance on the deck or more elaborate festivities on grander occasions. A bright-eyed blonde was charming yesterday in a mixture of blue serge and red holland. The underdress was of blue, cut round and plain. The Directory jacket was also of blue serge, with square jacket flaps, incroyable revers and cuffs of red holland, all richly embroidered in navy and gold braid. The inside vest, [illegible] and buttoning close, was of holland fairly overrun with gay embroidery. There was a smart little walking jacket to match, a soft, blue-felt hat with gold cord on the curly head, and in the small hands, gloved in red suede, was held a boatswain's whistle, which hung about her neck by a lanyard. A boyish-looking brunette, whom it cost no effort not to address as 'chappie,' paced the quarter deck, her lips puckered in tune for 'The Girl I Left Behind Me,' her hands thrust deep in the pockets of her reefing jacket. Her gown, of cream white flannel, had a long tunic drapery in front, showing an underdress of the same material embroidered in a conventional patern of rosettes and scollops in navy blue and gold cord, the same embroidery being repeated, this time in silk floss, on the cuffs, collar and belt of her silk yachting blouse. Now and then a little breeze bearing the pungent odor of brine fluttered the skirts and displayed to the summer world a pair of small, white canvas ties laced with blue and gold. The same wind ruffled short, dark curls on which was set a smart little white glazed sailor hat trimmed with a neat twirl of blue and gold ribbon. Arm in arm with this good fellow walked a tall, slender companion whose dusky hair flew, unbound, in a cloud about her shoulders, and whose eyes had weird depths of darkness in them as she looked unsmiling over the cheerful, laughing sea. This ocean maiden was gowned in solid blue serge with long Greek draperies in front, opening on the right side to show an underskirt of cream white serge on which was laid, to form a wide Greek fret border, lines of fine crimson and gold cords and narrow, blue ribbons. Gold anchors were embroidered on the corners of the drapery, and the bodice had a double vest of white with the Greek fret introduced in the same manner as on the skirt. Over this was worn a short jacket with gilt buttons. When the dancing began four young girls in one of the sets attracted much attention. They wore accordion-plaited skirts of yellow India silk trimmed with yellow lace and as like one another as four peas. Over these were donned four silk yachting blouses, one of white, one of pale pink, one of scarlet and one of pale green. Lace hats crowned with flowers were worn in the blouse colors."

FROM WANDERERS DOWN IN MAINE.—"We came across three women farmers the other day the story of whose doings might interest you. Driven out of the woods somewhere above East Norridgewock, for lack of provisions, we met a good-looking woman in widebrimmed felt hat and thick boots driving an ox team. Inquiring of her where we could obtain a dinner, we were directed to a long low farm house, a weather-beaten pink in color, standing under a group of magnificent maple trees. Here we found two other women, intelligent looking like the first, one digging potatoes, the other canning berries in a spic and span kitchen and apparently on a large scale. We had stumbled on a partnership, the members to which are all feminine. It seems that two of the women are sisters, the Misses F—, and that the farm belonged to their father who left it to them in a somewhat run down and unprofitable condition. Unable to sell except at a sacrifice, they were puzzled as to their proper line of action until Miss M—, who had inherited a little money and earned a little more in the millinery business, tired of the confinement of indoor life, proposed to go in with them and test the question whether women could make a farm pay. They are not fine lady farmers by any means, overlooking things in a Dresden china sort of way, but spend much of their time at such work as is not too heavy for them in the open air. They have about 200 acres, a part of which is in pasture, and on the rest they grow potatoes, turnips, carrots, onions, cabbages and the crops of the general farmer. They have an apple orchard in a fine state of cultivation, and raise quantities of blackberries and raspberries and some other small fruits, which they can for the Boston market. They do their own milking, make butter, when the factory is not running, feed their own pigs, ride the mowing machines and the reapers and help in all the operations of mowing and harvesting. For the heavier work they have two farm laborers, sometimes in the busy season three. They read the "Atlantic Monthly" and are progressive Yankee women with ideas about temperance and dress reform. They are all three in excellent health, have forgotten the meaning of headache and say they like their work and are able to make a fair living. In the winter they frequently chop wood with their men."

FROM THE PROUD POSSESSOR OF A BROTHER AT YALE.—"We had a tennis party at Great Barrington on Saturday, and between you and me it was quite a pretty affair. All the young men who were invited were Yale students and accordingly we had a deep blue awning—the college color—spread under a group of oaks overlooking the lawn. Beneath this was the tea table with a scarf of blue silk running the length of the cloth. For the central ornament we had a low antique bowl of blue china holding white lilies and occasionally trailing water lilies with their twisting stems. Beside each plate were set small tennis shoes of white straw filled with blue chiccory alternating with miniature tennis rackets having clusters of blue bachelors' buttons knotted upon them with blue ribbons. These were for favors, and very pretty they looked hanging from the girls' waists by their long streamers. All the girls who received wore white gowns with blue sashes and carried bunches of blue flowers. The Yale men sang their college glees and with them they mingled songs of the sea and of the country lanes, every suggestion being of coolness, of sparkle, of the green grass and trees of midsummer. I have seen only one fete this summer that was prettier and that was a grape party at Stockbridge a few days before. The wide verandas of the cottage furnished the assembling rooms and these were draped with green vines which hung like portieres in the doorways. Huge white marble vases stood in corners filled with double white hollyhocks, wild carrot and caraway blossoms and stalks of feathery grasses. Tea was served in the fruit garden under a long grape arbor. The table was covered with a cloth of pinkish green silk embroidered in purple floss with grape clusters. In the middle of the table was a crystal bowl piled high with green and white grapes half hidden in their own leaves. The hostess wore a pale green silk Josephine dress with a purple scarf at her waist and the attendants were maids in white dresses with vine leaves on their hair. There was a harvest dance of children dressed as cupids and nymphs in the edge of the evening."

FROM THE ADIRONDACK WILDERNESS.—"The yew bow is the latest appendage of the woman who plunges among the trees. Wherever you come upon a camping party the summer girl, be she climbing a wooded slope or picking berries in an open glade, abandons her ribbon-tied Alpenstock and leans like Maid Marion on a bow. This sudden passion for Robin Hood's weapon does not imply a high degree of the archer's skill. Indeed, many of the belted and tasseled damsels would be at a loss if called upon to nock the arrow or draw the string. Though a few of them can knock over a partridge or a heron at short range, the design of the archer's outfit is nothing more or less in most instances than to justify a pretty and convenient woods costume. A typical example of the bowman's dress is worn by a Brooklyn girl whose party have been in camp for a month on one of the best grounds. The gown is a dark hunter's green serge, the skirt of which is turned up in a hem eight or ten inches wide and which falls only a trifle below the knees. With this is worn a loose sailor blouse of the same color and material, brier stitched in white and with a crimson tie knotted under the collar. Rubber-soled buskins without heels cover the feet, and above these are buckled leggins of undressed tawny leather reaching above the knees. On her head she places a green serge fore-and-aft cap, and about her waist is a belt of the same tawny leather, holding a pouch for the arrows, tassel and spare strings. The bow itself which, like a muff or a parasol, completes the toilet, is a little over five feet long between nocks, and its strength is about twenty-six pounds. It is a fine piece of yew, valued at nearly $100, and makes a pretty appearance with its crimson plush-covered handle. To do this Brooklyn girl justice she practices shooting at a target nearly every windless day and is quite absorbed in the care of her turkey feathered arrows."

FROM A WELL-KNOWN LITERARY WOMAN WHO HAS BOUGHT A VACATION HORSE FOR HER CHILDREN.—"I tried the stable for a while, but the board money burned in my pocket, and before the first week was over I was the owner of a steed. He is, I admit, not a thing of beauty, though he apparently has been a horse forever. He is not fortunate in his color, being a dark shade of white, mottled with a kind of crushed strawberry spots. His gait is a little undulatory, especially on a down grade, where he finds it convenient to favor one of his off legs. He is not burdened with superfluous flesh and has served as an object lesson in anatomy to our children, thus enabling us to combine instruction with pleasure as we jog along. Architecturally considered, he would perhaps be classified as a specimen of the pointed gothic, would be called by archaeologists antique, and by the ladies possibly a moire antique. The name by which he is known among the people whose parents he has outlived is 'Whalebone,' which gives some clue to his character. The young members of the family wished him rechristened, and to please both of them we added the word, 'Hatty,' subsequently changed to 'Dick.' The young man of the household, following a taste we fear vitiated by surreptitious reading, added his mite to the horse's name, so that at present he is known in the family which he adorns as 'Whalebone Ned; or, the Phantom of the Plains.'"

FROM A PRETTY NARRAGANSETT MAID.—"Here is the device of one Narragansett girl. Wearing a pale blue muslin gown embroidered about the bottom in pink and gold tinsel, with a pink and gold scarf about her waist and a leghorn hat on her head, from which droop garlands of pink and yellow roses, she takes her seat at the fashionable driving hour every afternoon, in what sort of a vehicle do you suppose? What but a hand cart or push cart, perhaps you call it, of the same sort as those used by city costermongers, but minus the bells over the top, neatly finished in black and gilt and sumptuously cushioned. With a blue gauze parasol knotted with pink ribbon to shade her face and a tall footman in knee breeches to propel her, she looks as well content as if she had chosen for her pleasuring any one of her dozen or more dog carts or wagons at her command. This eccentric belle comes from Denver and they say she has money to throw away. She is quite pretty and doesn't appear conscious that she is doing anything strange."

FROM ATLANTIC CITY.—"There is one thing that occupies women's thoughts in summer to the exclusion of the suffrage and that is hair. What becomes of the possessor of tresses in a damp season? Where is the use of spending hours at one's mirror to make feathers lightly blowing about one's temple or rings that catch the light in their love curls when ten minutes of fog or sea turn will reduce the whole to dank, wet-looking strings? Where is the joy of passing one's summer on yachts and rocks if pretty hair is to be impossible from June to October? Here is where the summer youth has an incontestable advantage. He can sit down before the clipping machine and rise up to pass the season in his skull. He does not have to labor over an artistically careless coiffure to see Dame Nature lay it in inartistically careless rains. Enviable male!"

MISSED BY A RATTLER.

An Incident Recalled by Dr. Conklin of New York's Menagerie.

"I would rather treat almost any sick animal in the world than a sick snake," said Dr. Conklin, the superintendent of the Central Park menagerie to a New York Sun reporter the other day. "Not that I mind handling a snake particularly, but on account of the accidents that are likely to happen.

"A few years ago," continued the doctor, "I had an experience in treating a sick boa constrictor that will last me until the end of my life. We had at that time a big cage of boa constrictors and several poisonous snakes as well in the lion house. Very often a snake's mouth becomes sore, and it is necessary to rub medicines between its jaws to save its life. One of our constrictors was afflicted this way. I prepared some medicine and went into the house one night with a new attendant we had just hired. This young man's name was Joe, and he had been a snake performer with a traveling menagerie. The sides of the cage were of glass, as they are now, and inside were about forty snakes of all kinds. There were a dozen big constrictors, a python or two, and a score of rattlers, moccasins and copperheads. As Joe began rattling the door of the cage the inmates woke up, and when they saw the light they were ready for a fight. The sick snake lay at the other end of the cage. The usual way in such cases is to throw a rope noose over the snake's neck and drag him to the cage door. Then his head is drawn out and covered with a meal bag or piece of carpet. After that it is easy enough to catch him back of the head, press open his jaws, and rub in the medicine. This was done up to the point where his head should have been drawn out through the door. The rattlers and other small snakes were twisted together in a squirming tangle in the upper end of the cage, and the sick constrictor was threshing his big tail about like a dying whale.

"'I'll go inside, Mr. Conklin,' said Joe, 'and give it to him there. I ain't afraid of any snake that ever crawled.'

"Before I could stop him he sprang into the cage and grabbed the constrictor back of the head, opening his mouth a yard wide, it seemed to me. Then he took the bottle in his left hand and proceeded to rub the sore spots. Of course he was busy watching his patient and didn't have eyes for any thing else. But it was different with me. I saw one of the biggest rattlers coiled for a spring. If he bit Joe it would be certain death, and inside of a fraction of a second the blow would be struck. My blood seemed to turn into ice water. My head swam round and round, and my heart stopped beating. I would have called out, but my tongue was hot and dry and stuck to the roof of my mouth. I finally managed to spring toward the door. At that instant the rattlesnake darted his head forward with a vicious spring, landing between Joe's fingers. At the same instant Joe dropped the constrictor's head and sprang from the cage to the ground.

"'Suck your hand quick,' I shouted, 'and here's some whisky. Don't waste a minute, man. Time is precious.'

"'What's the matter?' he asked, as though surprised at my command.

"'Matter enough. You're bitten by a rattler.'

"'Not quite as bad as that,' he said, with a little laugh. 'It bit the bottle in my hand. I'm not touched. That's nothing. I didn't think you saw it.'

"I'm not a coward by nature," continued the doctor as he reached for his hat, "but I felt as weak as any baby when Joe stopped talking, and the next man who expects to go into a rattlesnake cage with my consent must chloroform me first."

"I wuz wo'kin ez po'tah on the Louisville & Nashville road two years ago," said the young colored barber to a Chicago Herald reporter, "an' had a great time once while runnin' up ter Nashville. A little German got aboa'd at New Orleans weth a large market basket an' a grip. He han's me over the basket, an' sez he, 'I vant yer ter tak goot keer off dat basket, po'tah; it's my lunitch!' 'Yes, sah, su't'nly, sah. I'll take keer on it, sah!' I sez, an' stows it away in a closet. 'No, sah, not er bite; feelin' pockish myse'f,' I sez. Well, he rubbed his stommick a minit, an' I sez, jokin' like, 'gotter basket b'longin' ter one o' the pass'ngers.' 'Less see it,' he sez. So I got it out an' opened her up. Chicken 'san'wiches, pickles, biskets, a roast goose, two dozen seegars, a bottle of cognac, an' another one o' claret, was inside. Lawd! how our mouths did water an' both of us was so hungry! We each took er biskit, then nibbled at the goose, an' then the conductor sampled the brandy while I took er pull at the claret. I was going to quit anyways, so I jumped the job an' come on ter Chicago an' hev stayed yer ever since."

DON'T CUT DOGS' TAILS.

A Ridiculous Theory That Encourages the Mutilation of Animals.

If we recollect rightly it is Hugh Dalziel who tells of a time in Great Britain when dogs without tails were exempt from taxation; and so to chop off a dog's tail was to lop off with it one's tribute to the crown. That time, if it ever existed, is now as hazy as the reign of good King Womba, and in the degenerate present the most that can be said in defence of docking the tails of dogs and cropping their ears is that fashion calls for such mutilations. And the whims of fashion are quite as apt to be dictated by perverted tastes as by good sense. Witness the dock-tailed horses of our avenues and the villainous high checkreins, both of them a reproach to humanity.

The practice of docking horses' tails, it is true, is not without defence on the ground of utility; veterinary surgeons there are who aver that to cut the tail off short is beneficial to the physical condition of the horse. Nor are there wanting advocates of docking dogs' tails for hygienic reasons. The notion is entertained by many ignorant people, and stoutly enough defended, that a puppy's tail must be cut off because in the end of it is a worm, and this worm is the cause of distemper. Cut off the tail and thus remove the worm, say these sapient grannies, and the dog will never be ailing.

This "vulgar error" of the worm in the end of the dog's tail is widely prevalent, and thousands of puppies have sacrificed their brushes in consequence thereof. A similar superstition holds with respect to a mythical worm in the cow's tail, which must be cut out to insure the cow's good health. It is not difficult to understand that the white cords of the tail, in dog or cow, might have been mistaken by an ignorant person for worms, and that in this way the curious belief about their removal may have arisen. But the strange thing is that intelligent dog owners will accept this ridiculous theory of the worm in the tail, when propounded by ignorant individuals, whose opinion would be received on no other subject under heaven; and will countenance the mutilations which are based on the silly superstition.

The Borough's Prosperity.

The rapid increase in the valuation of real and personal estate in North Plainfield, during the past six years, speaks highly of our neighbor's attractiveness and popularity. The following figures of growth "over the brook," will be interesting reading:

	Real Estate.	Personal Estate.
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

The reason of the seeming decline in the valuation of personal estate in 1888, was caused by the passage of a law which provided that property should be taxed where found with no reference to the residence of the owner. Formerly a North Plainfield resident doing business in this city, paid taxes on that business property to the Township in which he lived. Now the taxes go where the business is located.

The result was that $60,000 worth of assessed property had to be taken from Assessor Brokaw's books. Yet in spite of that the valuation is increasing every year since.

PLAINFIELD'S CASE EXACTLY.

The Asbury Park Journal, the mouth piece of Mr. Bradley, says: "There were those who stood by Mr. Bradley, and there were those who did not. The relative bulk of the two factions are as an ant hill to a mountain. Of course the great "moral sentiment" of the place was with Mr. Bradley, but that same moral sentiment was content to confine its helpful aid to a generous willingness to look on while Mr. Bradley fought; and the greater his peril the farther off they stood. In his hours of temporary triumph—and he had many of them—they gathered around him bravely.

"This has been the nature of his support, and, heavy as he is, he has been led to exclaim, 'The fight is too big for me alone.' The sale of liquor has increased until it is safe to say that there are today one hundred places in Asbury Park where liquor is unlawfully sold.

"Mr. Bradley does not want to see a licensed saloon in Asbury Park, but the proposition he makes is as clear as noonday. Would not an open, licensed saloon in Asbury Park be actually preferable to the one hundred or more smoking dens now in existence?

"We do not want even a single open saloon here, but we do want the absolute enforcement of the present laws. Prohibition is in fact and truth a dead letter here, but it is no fault of the law. By their apathy the people of this place have just as surely killed prohibition as if they had gone to the polls and voted against it, for apathy is as bad as opposition. The lesson here may profit elsewhere and it may possibly be of value here."

THE [illegible] MEN'S PARADE.

The [illegible] men of this city, principally the grocers and butchers, paraded about the streets of the city early Monday morning with their gayly decorated business wagons, previous to starting for Arbor Villa, at Boynton Beach, where they spent the day, holding a grand clam bake, and other out-door amusements. About twenty wagons, most of them handsomely decorated, made up the procession. Possibly the wagons of Mr. Geo. W. Rockfellow and Geo. A. Moore, were the most attractive.

The picnickers were accompanied by both the Plainfield and South Plainfield bands. At the grove during the forenoon the grocers and butchers employees played base ball. The latter won the game by a score of 8 to 7. In the afternoon when the bosses played the score was reversed. The grocers won by a score of 10 to 4.

City Council Meeting.

The members of the City Council met in regular session at 8.30 o'clock Monday night with President Dumont in the chair. The other members present were Messrs. [illegible], Gallup, Jenkins, March and Rowland—6. The reading of the minutes was dispensed with.

A petition from Emma F. Fox and others for a crosswalk at Broadway and [illegible] place was referred to the Street Committee, and a similar petition from the Secretary of the Seventh Day Baptist church for a crosswalk at Arlington avenue and Ninth street, was referred with power.

A petition for an additional light on Prospect avenue, was presented, referred and subsequently refused, as the Committee reported that the funds for street lighting is exhausted.

Petitions were also received from property owners both on Park and Prospect avenues, asking to have these avenues repaired and put in good condition. Referred.

A petition from Plainfield avenue property owners calling attention to the condition of that thoroughfare, and the urgent necessity for repairs to the same, was referred to the Street Committee. Space will not permit us to publish the petition in full today.

A communication was received and filed from Frank Campbell of Liberty street, accompanied by a claim of $19.50 for alleged damages by water.

The usual batch of claims for work on the streets, police services, fire department bills, and other claims of a miscellaneous nature, were presented and referred to the proper committees.

The City Auditor reported as follows on the validity of certain claims of T. W. Morrison. The report was received and filed:

To the Honorable the Common Council:

GENTLEMEN:—There has been filed in the office of the City Clerk, as you requested, the opinion of the Corporation Counsel on the matter of the validity of advertising city ordinances and other official notices in a daily newspaper without one week's time intervening between the two necessary insertions.

In accordance with cited illustrations drawn from the Charter, and General Statutes, the opinion concludes that "the failure to allow one week to intervene between the two insertions of the notices in question, does not invalidate the publication."

This legal decision will guide the Auditor hereafter in all cases where advertisements of city matters are ordered published by your honorable body in any official daily newspaper.

But the bills of T. W. Morrison are for advertisements not ordered by your honorable body, which were inserted when the "Evening News" was not designated an official newspaper; and further put in the paper after the City Clerk had taken the precaution personally to notify the editor not to insert the notices. This was done by the Clerk because a further publication was unnecessary, all the required advertisements having been published in the two weekly papers as the Charter specified and your honorable body directed, and their publication in a third newspaper would incur a needless expense. Hence the bills for $93.30 cannot be audited.

O. B. LEONARD,
City Auditor.
Plainfield, N. J., Sept. 2, 1889.

The monthly reports of the treasurer and collector were received. The former was referred to the Finance Committee, and the latter was filed. The treasurer also called attention to the fact that three notes, one for $1,000 on the General Fund, $500 from the Poor Fund and $500 from the Fire Department Fund, fall due on September 6.

The quarterly report of the Overseer of the Poor was received and filed.

The City Judge sent in a detailed report of the number of cases brought before him for violation of the city ordinances, between June 2 and September 2. In all there were 36 cases; 15 fines were imposed, and in the other cases the guilty persons were either committed or discharged. $127 was received from fines.

A lengthy written opinion of the Corporation Counsel on the matter of rebuilding mill dams was received and filed. In substance it was to the effect that the city has no voice in the matter, and that the law applies to townships only.

The various committees reported on the claims sent in during the evening, and they were transferred to the Auditing Committee.

The Fire and Building Committee reported having granted the former petitions of Messrs E. C. Mulford and Mr. A. [illegible], the former to repair a frame building, and the latter to erect a dwelling house at Madison avenue and Sixth street.

Mr. March made a verbal report on the matter of a street railway, stating that Mr. Leo Daft had exhibited his electric motor, in compliance with a resolution adopted by the Council at a previous meeting. The car, he said, would be on exhibition again today. Mr. March further said that the Committee felt satisfied that the car would do all that Mr. Daft claimed for it.

At this stage in the proceedings Mr. [illegible] came.

Mr. March made a motion which prevailed, to the effect that when the Council adjourn it be to meet again in two weeks.

An appropriation of $1,000 was made for work on the streets, upon motion of Mr. March.

Saturday's Trotting Events.

There were three races on the track of the Gentlemen's Driving Park Association on Saturday. The first was between M. Quinn's "Lucy" and Mr. Bloodgood's black gelding. "Lucy" took two straight heats in 2:56 and 2:57½.

Then followed an exciting race between Mr. Brandon's b. g., "Wichita," O. T. Waring's "Copeland," and J. W. Johnson's "Lady Thistle." Both heats were won by "Wichita," with the other horses following in the order named. Time, 2:34½ and 2:31½.

In the concluding race there were four entries, namely: P. Jenner's "Blanche," John Hayes' "Andy," N. Honeyman's bay stallion, and C. Brower's "Galatia." "Blanche" won first heat in 2:51½, and "Andy" the second in 2:56½.

Mr. C. Brower's "Pequot" and John Chandler's "Rambo" trotted an exhibition mile. "Pequot" crossed the line in 2:29½ thus winning the heat.

The Trial of the Daft Electric Car. A Complete Success.

The crowds of people who had the opportunity Monday of taking a ride on Mr. Daft's electric car, unite in commendation of it in every way. Its running was absolutely perfect and the car itself was a thing of beauty and comfort. Even some of the lady visitors were allowed to start and stop it, to prove how simple and easily controlled the motor was.

The car is absolutely self-contained—deriving its energy while running entirely from the batteries underneath the seats and therefore not in any way affecting the rails or any surrounding objects. When the charge in the batteries is partially exhausted the car is run into the charging house and connected with the main leads at the dynamo which refill the cells in from 3½ to 4 hours. The car is then ready to run from thirty to thirty-five miles. There is absolutely no danger, as the potential or electric pressure is only 175 volts, which is perfectly safe under all possible conditions. The machinery is of the most substantial character, and with a factor of safety sufficient to permit of reversing at full speed in cases of emergency—which stops the car in less than its own length, a most valuable characteristic in crowded thoroughfares.

There are of course no obstructions on the streets whatever, except the independent rails. The car is brilliantly lighted by electricity and there are call bells at the side to signal the conductor, also powerful alarm gongs underneath the car, all of which are actuated by the batteries. It is therefore an electric car from beginning to end.

About 1,000 persons were carried yesterday afternoon—Mr. F. E. Marsh officiating a considerable part of the time as engineer. An almost exact fac-simile of this car, with the same equipment of storage batteries, has been running for several months past in New Orleans, and has been so eminently satisfactory that the railroad company have determined to change their whole installation to this system, to effect which change the Superintendent is now taking vigorous measures. The Newark and Bloomfield railway officials have also adopted it on their Prospect avenue line.

Ex-Judge Harper Impressively Addresses a Large Audience.

Reform Hall was well filled Sunday evening last. Doctor Barnett, as one of the Vice Presidents of the Reform Club, occupied the chair. Mr. Cleaver officiated as chaplain, and a full choir under the leadership of Mr. Vanderbeek conducted the musical exercises.

The speaker of the occasion was ex-Judge Harper, who commenced his remarks by declaring as a historical fact worthy of remembrance that the grandest achievements for the benefit of humanity, the triumphs of science, the spread of enlightened knowledge, and reformations of every name and kind, have been secured in the face of virulent opposition and many discouragements, and only by patient and unswerving fidelity to the convictions of truth and right. From this starting point the speaker dwelt upon the wonderful inventive progress of the present century, calling to mind special instances, and the mighty practical results wrought out of small and feeble beginnings when firmly upheld and resolutely carried onward.

Judge Harper then presented to view and particularized the great advancement made in the saving cause of temperance, which he eulogized as the noblest reform work of the age, and counseled to the sure means of its final success, the harmonious and faithful concentration of effort on the part of all opponents of [illegible], that devastating curse, which was filling the land with crime, misery and death. "Push on the battle without fear or favor. Discard [illegible]; cast aside all personal animosities. Work on work ever. Register a vow of total abstinence and keep the pledge inviolate. Do the right for the sake of right, and trust in Jehovah for wisdom and strength to win the glorious victory," was the concluding words.

The choir then sang "The Handwriting on the Wall," after which Miss Kitty [illegible] of New York, was again introduced, and in her faultless manner recited with thrilling effect the temperance poem entitled "—Drunk, and only sixteen." A few pertinent remarks from Mr. Cleaver on behalf of the pledge, brought the meeting to a close.

"As Full of Wealth and Handsome Equipages as Plainfield."

In speaking of the county roads for which contracts to build have just been awarded as told in last week's Press, the Elizabeth Journal says, among other things, "The selection of the third road, from Plainfield to the Cranford line, will not please everybody, but under all the circumstances the board did well in selecting it. Plainfield pays a good share of the costs, and should have some of the benefits, and the road reaching as far as Cranford in the direction of Elizabeth will be no small importance to a city so full of wealth and handsome equipages as Plainfield.

"It is unfortunate that the whole of this central thoroughfare could not have been built this year, but there is this ad-

The Dunellen Presbyterian Church Refitted and Altered.

The First Presbyterian church at Dunellen, reopened Sunday last, after having been closed for four weeks for needed repairs. All were surprised at the appearance of the church, which has been newly papered, cushioned and carpeted in a style which reflects great credit to all interested.

In the morning communion was administered. In the evening the choir, composed of Miss Ella Boice, organist, Miss Jennie Runyon, Miss May Harold, Miss Myra Runyon, Miss Mabel [illegible] and Messrs Samuel Merrill, Wm. Terry, Chas. Love, of this city, spoke from a text in the 28th chapter of Genesis, after which Mr. Shellenger made a few fitting remarks congratulating the people on their enterprise in refitting the church, and also presented to the church an elegant communion table, which stood in the pulpit, as the gift of Mrs Adam Craig, in memoriam of her late husband who was a member of the church for so many years.

NETHERWOOD NOTES.

On Friday evening last, sixty-four guests assembled in the grand parlor of the Hotel Netherwood, where they found tables prepared for their reception. The event was a progressive euchre party. At 8.30 the contestants commenced the game and finished at 11 o'clock. The prizes, which had been purchased for the occasion by Mrs Jas. R. Plum, received the warmest commendation, not only from the players, but from the household generally. The prizes were duly distributed and the fortunate winners congratulated by their friends.

A game of base ball was played Saturday afternoon last, between the married and single men, which drew a large crowd on the grounds near the Hotel. The game was most exciting and elicited hearty applause, upon the exhibition of excellent playing by both sides.

The contestants were—married men: Messrs Martin, VanZandt, Cullen, Parsons, Whiting, Ebberts, Buchanan and Bridgeman.

The single men were: Messrs Gibson, Rice, Watson, Plum, Ryer, George, Anthony, Cummings and Foster. The result was a victory for the single men, by a score of 27 to 21.

A full dress hop on Saturday evening concluded the festivities of the week, at this charming resort.

Yesterday the Fall season opened with the brightest of prospects. The season has been truly phenomenal, and the large booking for the queen month of the Autumnal season, warrants me in predicting a most enjoyable one in every sense. Our worthy host, Mr. Frank E. Miller, is ever watchful for the comfort and happiness of his patrons, and the records will show one of the most prosperous and delightful seasons under his administration. We at present have about 175 guests.

North Plainfield Petit Jurors.

Sheriff Tunison on August 31, drew a panel of 50 names before Judges Bartine, Jameson and TenEyck, to serve as petit jurors at the September term of the Somerset county courts. The list is pretty evenly distributed among the respective townships. The names of the jurors drawn from North Plainfield, are: Henry A. Voehl, Peter Benward, Thomas Newman, John H. Goodwin, Edward C Morse.

Winners of the Olympia Prizes.

Chas. Krewson, gold watch, score 233; H. Willett, silver watch, score 231; Chas. VanWinkle, silk umbrella, score 227; Geo. Swain, gold ring, score 223; C. A. Reed, opera glasses, score 219; J. W. Drayton, bowling shoes, score 214.

Twelve scores were made over 200, one of which was 258, but being connected with the alley, was excluded from the prizes.

Bazaar at The Crescent.

The Rainbow Bazaar, which is to be held by the ladies of the All Saints memorial church of Scotch Plains, at The Crescent, on the afternoons and evenings of Sept. 6 and 7, will be one of the most elaborate and complete affairs of this nature ever presented in this locality. The decorations will be of the seven rainbow colors, and the appearance of the hall is promised to be exceptional and unique.

Fancy costumes will be worn upon the floor and in the booths by the ladies in charge of the several departments. Some of the toilets will be very startling and altogether pretty. Promenade concerts will be given every evening, while a "chef de cuisine" from New York will serve an oyster supper of exceptional merit. Tickets are on sale as advertised elsewhere.

Is That the Secret of the Matter?

(From the Trenton True American.)

The editor of the Gazette is very much surprised that Asbury Park Bradley should be willing to abandon prohibition for high license. Mr. Bradley has tried prohibition and finds that it does not prohibit, and is therefore willing to try something else. What he wants is practical results connected, of course, with a certain amount of worldly profits. He has very large interests in Asbury Park and he has ascertained that he cannot keep liquor out if he lets people in. It is necessary for the success of the place that people should be comfortable there and so Mr. Bradley is willing that liquor shall be sold, especially if it be sold under conditions which will produce a considerable income to the municipal government, or in other words, to Bradley. That is the secret of the matter.

John Reed Arrested [illegible] the Dunellen Accidents.

On Wednesday, August 28, a man by the name of John Reed was jailed on a warrant from Justice Cole, of Dunellen, on charges of drunkenness and disorderly conduct and trespassing on the cars. It is now learned that the Central railroad authorities think that he is the man who recently wrecked two trains at Dunellen. The officials are reticent as to the evidence in their possession. But they say that interesting developments may be given the public.

The evidence against Reed must be supplemented by other testimony before anything can be done in the case. Reed is now in the Middlesex county jail for thirty days on the charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct. He denies, of course, all knowledge of the wreck.

On the charge of trespassing on the cars he has been held to await the action of the grand jury.

SCOTCH PLAINS SCRATCHINGS.

When August Hoppell went away to Brooklyn several years ago, leaving the paternal home behind him, he turned his attention to groceries. He took to this business so well, that in a very short time he started out for himself, and is now the proprietor of a grocery store in that city. Needing a capable assistant, he has taken George [illegible] to Brooklyn with him. George had acquired considerable skill behind the counter of Baker & Mead; he has now gone to a larger sphere of activity, and Mr. Wm. Buckley occupies his place.

∴

Mr. Jahn is now comfortably settled in his new quarters. He is in a better location than he was before, and has considerable more room. Mr. Jahn keeps a dog that looks as if he meant business.

∴

I heard some one remark the other day that Mr. Brower's alligator had been enjoying poor health. The reptile is better, however, and has a larger appetite. He ate a toad a few days ago.

∴

Mr. Hall has returned from Newport.

∴

Speaking of Mr. Hall, I see by a notice in the post office that the time has at last arrived when books may be taken from the library. To entitle anyone to draw books he must have a card for that purpose signed by the Librarian. The cards can only be obtained on Wednesday evenings, that being the time at which the Librarian, Mr. Johnston, is always on hand. But after a card has once been procured books may be drawn with it at any of the times when the library is open, and which are Wednesdays and Saturdays, from 3 to 6 and from 7.30 to 10 P. M., and Mondays from 7.30 to 10.

This circulating feature of the library is likely to be appreciated, as there are many valuable works to be found on its shelves, including a great number of books which one often wishes to read but which it hardly pays to buy outright. The game rooms, smoking apartments and the well supplied files of magazines and papers continue to hold their attractions.

Fire on the Mountain.

At three o'clock last Thursday fire was discovered in the building known as "Sunnyside," on the mountain, owned by Mr. Wallace Vail. The structure was of frame, and consequently the fire burned rapidly. The building was entirely consumed, and the loss will be considerable. As the place was unoccupied, the origin of the fire is attributed to an incendiary.

Plainfields Everywhere.

People who wonder why letters for this city so often go astray because misdirected, can somewhat understand the possibility when informed that there are fifteen "Plainfields" in the United States, and three in Canada, besides a "Plainfield Centre" in New York, and a "Plainfield Springs" in Vermont.

The "Plainfields" are in New Jersey, Arkansas, California, Dakota, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, Ohio Pennsylvania, Vermont and Wisconsin.

Rescued From a Runaway.

The family of Mr. John M. Crane, of Central avenue, were riding under the railroad bridge at Park avenue, Thursday afternoon, when the horse took fright at a passing train overhead, and started up the street at a terrific pace.

Miss Crane, who was driving, courageously held on and kept the horse in the middle of the road, but even with the assistance of her mother, who also took hold of the reins, the animal could not be checked. As they reached Ninth street, Architect Fougate sprang out in the road, and at the risk of his life succeeded in stopping the horse.

A Most Painful Accident.

A girl 13 years old, in the employ of E. P. Stevens on GrandView avenue, while jumping over a fence this morning, caught her foot between the pickets and fell head forward to the ground with her foot fastened in the fence.

Neighbors heard her screaming and hastened to her assistance, but it was with considerable difficulty that she was extricated from her perilous position. It was found that she could not walk and suffered intense pain.

Dr. Jenkins was summoned and found the leg broken above the ankle. It was set and placed in splints, and the girl is now doing well.

Night Bloomers.

(From the Daily Press of Aug. 30.)

Mrs. Sarah Bradshaw, of Duer street, North Plainfield, has one of the finest specimens of the night-blooming cereus in this part of the country. It displayed elegant blossoms last night and Thursday, and is getting ready to continue its record to-night.

A beautiful plant in full bloom last night at the home of Mrs. R. MacDonald, corner of Front and Peace streets, attracted the admiration of the scores of passers by. A lighted lamp help to show it off.

Mrs. E. R. Pope has just cause for great pride over the handsome night-bloomers she possesses. They are a source of envy and praise all over the neighborhood.

Mr. S. B. Hope, of Richmond street, has a cereus that has been blooming every night for some time, with no signs of giving up. He would not be surprised if it blossomed up to next Easter.

Mrs. W. N. Martin gave a night-blooming reception at her home corner of Somerset and Chatham streets, last evening. Her handsome plant had on it five of the most elegant flowers that have been seen this season. It stood in the hall and everybody was invited in to enjoy its beauties.

—A horse belonging to Mr. Henry Voehl, the North Plainfield baker, ran away on New street Saturday afternoon, but so far as could be learned no damage resulted.

Sick Headache

Is a complaint from which many suffer and few are entirely free. Its cause is indigestion and a sluggish liver, the cure for which is readily found in the use of Ayer's Pills.

"I have found that for sick headache, caused by a disordered condition of the stomach, Ayer's Pills are the most reliable remedy."—Samuel C. Bradburn, Worthington, Mass.

"After the use of Ayer's Pills for many years, in my practice and family, I am justified in saying that they are an excellent cathartic and liver medicine [illegible]"—W. A. Westfall, M. D., V. P. Austin & N. W. Railway Co., Burnet, Texas.

"Ayer's Pills are the best medicine known to me for regulating the bowels, and for all diseases caused by a disordered stomach and liver. I suffered for over three years from headache, indigestion, and constipation. I had no appetite and was weak and nervous most of the time. By using three boxes of Ayer's Pills, and at the same time dieting myself, I was completely cured."—Philip Lockwood, Topeka, Kansas.

"I was troubled for years with indigestion, constipation, and headache. A few boxes of Ayer's Pills, used in small daily doses, restored me to health. They are prompt and effective."—W. H. Strout, Meadville, Pa.

ONE LOST AND TWO WON.

Three of the yellowest ball games ever put up in this city, were those of Saturday and Monday on the grounds of the Plainfield Bowling Club. Twenty-four flagrant and fragrant errors is the total charge against the Crescents as below, yet in spite of such a handicap the scalps of the West Ends and the Trentons again hang from the home team's girdle, and the Hackett-Carharts only won by the help of Umpire Keller.

Saturday's game was a most unsatisfactory one. It was the Crescents' intention to wipe up the dusty diamond with the West Ends—once more and for all. But their pitcher failed to appear, Condon and Bowes were put in the box, and Bradley—Somerville's kleptomaniac umpire—was scheduled to cover first base for Plainfield. The Crescents won in spite of all that, hanging seven runs out of Harkins in the first four innings.

The score was as follows:

Earned runs—Crescents, 1; West Ends, 2. Two base hits—Lee, Cadmus, Bowes (2), Williams. Home run—Harkins. Base on balls—Crescents, 5; West Ends, 4. Base on hit by ball—Crescents, 1; West Ends, 2. First base on errors—Crescents, 7; West Ends, 5. Flies caught—By Crescents, 7; by West Ends, 6. Time of game—2.25. Umpire—Mr. T. H. Keller.

Monday morning's game with the Hackett-Carharts was won by the Crescents in the beginning, but subsequently lost through Condon's errors on first, Bowes' poor throwing to second, the beautiful balls that Gately presented Moorhead, and the blundering stupidity of Umpire Keller. In spite of all this, the team that defeated the N. J. A. C., at Bergen Point in the afternoon by a score of 17 to 6, only had three runs the better of the Crescents.

Umpire—Mr. T. H. Keller.

The afternoon's game against Trenton's strong team was more gratifying. The Crescents for the third time ran up a total of eight errors by the infield, but the outfield as usual played a good game. McMurray's hits were great and timely. Keller's position as umpire was transferred to Cadmus with worse results. The former will not declare a man out if he does not see it. Monday afternoon Cadmus declared Gately out between first and second when the runner was not touched, and even if he had been the umpire could not have seen it. For some minutes after the hisses of the crowd could be heard a mile.

Death of an Old Resident.

Mr. Isaac Littell, aged about 74 years, an old and well-known resident near Willow Grove, died suddenly on Tuesday Aug. 27, soon after retiring, and without warning other than a chill. He had been about his farm as usual and attended to the milking. He complained of not feeling well and retired early. His death followed soon afterward. Mr. Littell was a brother-in-law of Mr. George W. Force of this city, both having married sisters.

What One Man Did on a Bike, With 40 Pounds of Baggage.

Captain Frank L. C. Martin, of the Plainfield Bicycle Club, started from this city, Aug. 17, as told in THE PRESS, on his bicycle, and rode through Scotch Plains, New Providence, Morristown, Morris Plains, Mount Tabor, Denville, Rockaway, Dover, Succasunny, Lake Hopatcong, Hurdtown, Woodport, Sparta, Newton, Stillwater, Blairstown, Hainesburg and Columbia, N. J., Portland, Pa., Delaware Water Gap, Shawnee, Stroudsburg and Bushkill to Dingman's Ferry, at which place he remained until Sept. 1, returning through Milford and Matamoras, Pa., Port Jervis, N. Y., Hugenot and Cuddebackville, Otisville, Middletown, Goshen, Chester, Monroe, Turners, Arden, Southfield, Tuxedo, Sloatsburg, Ramapo, Suffern, Tallmans, Monsey, Spring Valley, Nanuet, Nyack, (ferry across Hudson) Tarrytown, Yonkers and Kings Bridge to New York, wheeling all the way to Liberty street ferry.

At Delaware Water Gap he was joined by Louis Geyler, first lieutenant of the Century Wheelmen, of Phila, who was on a tour to New York, and together they rode to Dingman's Ferry, remaining over night. The following day Capt. Martin accompanied him to Port Jervis.

In the evening shortly after reaching the hotel in Hainesburg, a farmer rushed in and excitedly declared that he had just seen a giant passing down the road on a dead run, and was very much surprised when he was shown the bicycle and told that was what he had seen with a man on it. This story he accepted with a good deal of incredulity, as it was the first bike he had ever seen. The roads were mostly poor owing in a measure to the heavy rains of last month.

Captain Martin carried with him all his baggage in a valise attached to the backbone of his machine, and on the handle bars, weighing in all over forty pounds.

"TOM THE PEEPER."

The mysterious "Tom the Peeper" who has been frightening the female inhabitants of Elizabeth, for several weeks past, has at last turned up in this city, and to show that he really means business, is evident from the fact that two houses were entered on West Third street, during Thursday and the occupants were thoroughly alarmed.

Mr. and Mrs. James Dady occupy the ground floor of a dwelling house on West Third street, and Mr. and Mrs. Edward Ashton occupy rooms in the upper story. At two o'clock next morning Mrs. Ashton was aroused by a strange man prowling around in her bedroom. Thinking perhaps that it was her brother-in-law, who boards with the family, she called to him, and a stranger answered "yes" and descending a flight of stairs, passed out through the front door into the street.

An hour later Mr. John Kane's residence on the same street, was entered in some unaccountable manner, but nothing was taken.

At four o'clock the stranger returned to Mr. Dady's apartments, and this time he entered the house through the cellar. The man raised all of the windows and opened the doors on the ground floor, and after extinguishing a lighted lamp, he went direct to the room in which Mr. and Mrs. Dady were sleeping. The fellow lighted a number of matches, one of which set fire to the bed clothes, thus awaking Mrs. Dady. The latter aroused her husband who got up just in time to see the stranger depart through an open window. The man was chased for several blocks, but he escaped.

Mrs. Dady declares that she took hold of the intruder by the arm, whereupon the man pushed her aside and fled. The man is described as being tall and powerfully built, and wearing an overcoat.

While Mr. Dady and others were chasing the mysterious man, they found seated on Mr. Patrick Day's front stoop, one of the Muhlenberg Hospital patients, who was out for a morning walk, but as he did not answer the description given of "Tom the Peeper," he was not molested.

The mysterious and notorious "Tom the Peeper" was again up to his didos Friday night, but this time he was chased by a small army of men and boys who were armed with revolvers, shot guns, clubs and a cheese knife.

It was about two o'clock next morning when the stranger broke open a front window in Mrs. John Kane's residence on West Third street, and entered the house. Mrs. Kane declares that she saw the intruder, who was disguised with a wig and long curls. He also wore a cap. The woman yelled for assistance, and the fellow fled. A posse of about thirty men and boys started in pursuit of the peeper, but the latter scaled a fence and escaped.

On Thursday night in addition to the houses entered by the man, as told in Friday's PRESS, the stranger also entered the residences of Mrs. Amelia Willibald and Mrs. Reed, who occupy a double house along the railroad near Liberty street. In the former place he stole 25 cents, and in the latter he lighted a lamp and was ascending the stairs to the upper story, when Mrs. Reed's shrieks for help frightened him away. The fellow coolly set the lamp on the stairs, and ran out of the front door.

A Slight Tribute to the Memory of Mrs. Daniel Smith.

(Contributed.)

At the Locust Valley Reformed church, Long Island, there was held on Friday last the funeral services of a lady who died in this city on the previous Tuesday.

Having been an invalid during the three years of her residence in Plainfield, she was but little known outside of a few immediate friends, but her departure has left many a heart to mourn the loss of a noble, generous, sympathising woman, besides those who bear that deepest of all sorrows when the grave closes over a tender, loving mother.

On Thursday afternoon a short service was held at the residence of her son, Mr. Henry T. Smith, on Broadway, the Rev. Dr. Simpson officiating, and on Friday morning the remains of Mrs. Daniel Smith were borne on the last sad journey to her former home at Locust Valley, Long Island, where a large number of sympathising friends met the funeral party at the station.

The grief of those who had known her many years was profoundly expressed; and there mingled with the numerous friends and relatives, many and many of those who had been the recipients of her limitless generosity and whose hearts and homes she had cheered previous to her departure from Locust Valley.

Amid the fragrance of countless flowers and the church filled almost beyond its capacity, the three clergymen—the Rev. Dr. Irving of Troy, N. Y., Rev. Dr. Hart of Neshanic, and Rev. Dr. Snook of Locust Valley—all impressively conducted the service, each one speaking of the dead in the memory of her sweet, Christian faith, and as one whose life was all that a follower of the Cross of Jesus should be.

In the cemetery adjoining the church they laid her at rest in the August sunshine, which was not brighter than the example she has left for the world to follow; and if grief can be measured by flowers and tears, then great indeed to the friends has been the loss of Mrs. Daniel V. Smith.

KING AND QUEEN SHOOTING.

The King and Queen shooting by the Shooting Section of the Plainfield Gesang and Turn Verein, took place at Keller's grove on Monday, commencing at 9:30 A. M. Mr. Fred Haberle succeeded in shooting off the Eagle's head and was awarded the first prize of $5. The second prize, $3, went to the Shooting Section on account of an error, and Mr. Fred Bechtel captured the third prize, $2.

Following came the King shooting at the Eagle's body, and after about 200 bullets had winged by or imbedded themselves in the wooden carcass, Mr. Henry Kreuzfeld shot down the last piece and he was declared King of the "Plainfield Schuetzen Bund" for one year to come.

Miss Aug. Keller scored the most points on the target and was therefore made the Queen for one year. At two o'clock the shooters with all the members of the Plainfield Gesang and Turn Verein marched to the station, preceded by the new City Cornet Band, to receive guests from New York and Brooklyn who arrived on the 2:30 P. M. train in special cars.

The visitors, most of whom were handsome gold medals, presented a fine appearance, and after a short street parade, they were escorted to the grove where refreshments were served, and the crowning ceremonies of the King and Queen took place. Miss T. Schmidt in a neat speech presented both the King and Queen with handsome gold medals. Miss Schmidt was also presented with a handsome gift by Mr. Mennenbach, on behalf of the Shooting Section. Mr. Kreuzfeld, the King, thanked all present for the honor bestowed upon himself and the Queen, and invited all to "Schmetter" one with him.

Capt. Stockle of the Shooting Section thanked the visitors for their willingness to assist in building up the Plainfield Schuetzen Bund. Capt. Ludwig of the Independent Germania Schuetzen Corps of New York, responded, stating that New York and Brooklyn comrades were always ready to help a club in its childhood. The Plainfield club, he predicted, would prosper because the ladies took such an active part in it.

Remarks were also made by Captain Schroeder and ex-Captain Holz from the New York Schuetzen Guild, and Captain Rish from the Brooklyn Independent Schuetzen company. About 8 o'clock the visitors left for home.

"It goes right to the spot," said an old gentleman, who found great benefit in Dam's Sarsaparilla. He was right. Derangements of the stomach, liver, and kidneys are more speedily remedied by this medicine than by any other. It reaches the trouble directly.

Mr. Potter resides at Somerville, N. J., where he holds several positions of trust. During the Winter months Mr. Potter resides in Trenton and looks after the interests of the Pennsylvania R. R. Hay Fever.

That's just what the average man finds that he requires, two pairs of pants to every suit. We know this to be so from the quantity of separate pants we sell. To meet this demand we always keep a stock of independent pants of every shade of color, of every variety of material and of every size. At the beginning of the season the stock is fullest, of course, and it is a good time in which to match up a portion of a suit. No matter whether you are long or short, thick or thin, nor what kind of a suit you want to match, you will find what you want right here. If you don't you certainly will not find it anywhere else.

Pants to work in: pants to wear to business; pants for Sunday or dress, and pants fit to be married in. What more need we say? Step in and match up the old suit and thus save the cost of a new one for a month or two. Poor advice for us to give, you think? That's so, perhaps, but we'll secure your gratitude and good-will now, and your money for a new suit will follow later.

STORIES ABOUT DUELS.

Sometimes There Is Fun Even on the Field of Honor.

The Famous Irish Barrister's Proposition—An Antagonist in the Chimney—A Georgia Incident—De Witt Clinton's Plucky Opponent.

We sat in the smoking-room of one of the Long Island Sound steamers, says a writer in the New York Mail and Express, and an intelligent-looking member of the party, [illegible] related the anecdote of Curran, the celebrated Irish barrister, who fought a duel with a man much larger than himself. His opponent objected on the ground that, being the larger, he would be in the most danger of getting hit. But Curran said that should make no difference. They could chalk off on his adversary's body a space the exact size of his own form, and he would promise to shoot within the lines. The proposal was not accepted, but the duel was a harmless one.

"That reminds me," said another, [illegible] "of an English gentleman [illegible] a duel fought between an Englishman and a Frenchman. The weapons were pistols, and the place a room of pitch darkness. When the time came to fire the Englishman, not wishing to have the blood of another on his hands, discharged his pistol up the chimney—and he brought down the Frenchman! 'Now,' said the gentleman who [illegible], 'whenever I tell this story in France I always send the Englishman up the chimney.'"

Then another told of an incident that occurred in Georgia many years ago. A judge, celebrated as a duelist, who had lost a leg and who was known to be a dead shot, challenged a Colonel somebody, a humorous character and a man of great attainments. Friends tried to prevent the meeting, but to no effect. The parties met on the grounds, when the Colonel was asked if he was ready.

"No," he replied.

"What are you waiting for, then?" inquired the judge's second.

"Why, sir," said the Colonel, "I have sent my boy into the woods to hunt a bee gum to put my leg in, for I don't intend to give the judge any advantage over me. You see he has a wooden leg."

The party laughed and the fight was broken up. The Colonel was afterward told it would sink his reputation.

"Well," he replied, "it can't sink me any lower than a bullet can."

"But the papers will be filled about you."

"Well," said he, "I would rather fill fifty papers than one coffin."

This recalled a duel of an entirely different character between De Witt Clinton, once Governor of New York, with a plucky opponent, who was slightly wounded at the first fire.

"Are you satisfied?" asked Clinton.

"No, I am not," angrily responded the other.

They exchanged shots once more and he was wounded again. The former question was repeated, but he still demanded satisfaction.

The third time he was wounded, and Clinton asked: "Are you satisfied now?"

"No."

"Then go to thunder for satisfaction!" exclaimed Clinton, and, flinging down his pistol, he left the field.

"That's different," said one of the company, as he scraped out his pipebowl with his penknife, [illegible]

SOME RICH WOMEN.

Widows and Maids Worth a Million Dollars or More.

Most of Them Live in New York—Some Are Found in Society and Some Are to Be Found in the Whirl of Wall Street.

Mrs. Moses Taylor, the widow of the famous dry-goods merchant, says a New York paper, comes generally first into the mind of the New Yorker who bethinks him of the famously rich women of Manhattan Island. As a widow she seems to acquire the preeminence among her wealthy sex which widowhood gives to a beautiful woman among her unmarried sisters. Mrs. Taylor is carefully estimated to be worth not less than $25,000,000.

Mrs. Robert L. Stuart, the widow of the successful sugar merchant whose refineries were so long objects of interest along the North river, inherited from him $500,000 outright and a life interest in $20,000,000. Mrs. Marshall O. Roberts, who is often pointed out as the most desirable parti among fashionable widows, has a life interest in $1,000,000. This is much lower, and it is believed to be much nearer the truth, than most current estimates of her pecuniary charms.

"The Widow Hammersley" that was, now her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough, has a life interest in $5,000,000. She has it right here in this city, too, in custody of New York courts, so, as long as she lives, she can not cease to be a New Yorker. Mrs. Augustus Schell, widow of the famous Democrat and banker, has twelve solid millions of money while she lives. She can't will it away, however. Mrs. Frederick Stevens that was, now the Duchesse de Dino, is a New Yorker still to the tune of ten real golden millions of her own, and now, one may say, the Duke's, too.

Mrs. Robert L. Livingston, who is Elbridge Gerry's mother-in-law, is worth $5,000,000 "if she's worth a cent." That's the way an old crony of hers puts it. "But, la bless you, don't mention my name." And so the old crony's identity shall remain a secret. What she doesn't know about the rich women of New York is inaccessible, too. "There's Mrs. Frederick Gallatin," says she, "whose million is in cold cash and securities, most of it. It's finely fixed she is. And Mrs. Bradly Martin, who came from up the Hudson, who brings over her own brands of champagne, and who entertains with the best of the fine ladies in Scotland and England, too, had come to them. She's got two millions of her own besides all her husband's money.

Mrs. Robert Winthrop has a private fortune more than adequate to the maintenance of even such a fine old family name as hers. She has $10,000,000. Mrs. Percy Pyne has $10,000,000 of her own. Mrs. Fred Neilson, Freddy Gebhart's sister, has a cool million. It must always be remembered that a cool million seems the most desirable kind of a million. The same cool million represents also the private fortune of Mrs. Maturin Livingstone. Nobody will be surprised to hear that Mrs. Ogden Mills has a million of her own.

But O, ye young bachelors and middle-aged and old bachelors in search of rich wives, think what you have lost in the way of opportunities when you hear that the two elderly Misses Rhinelander have $6,000,000 between them and bid fair to leave it to collateral heirs with wonderfully fat accumulations!

Now, take Mrs. James P. Kernochan. She has $1,500,000 in money and real estate at a low estimate. All these estimates are low indeed. By the same apportionment Mrs. John C. Green has at least $2,000,000, and Mrs. Mason Jones, so often called by quaint old people "Lady Mary Mason Jones," she has $1,000,000 of her own and is contesting the Hammersley will besides.

Mrs. Josephine Ayer, the widow of the doctor who made a fortune in patent medicines, is said to have received from him about $5,000,000. Mrs. Martin Bates was left by her husband $1,000,000, which he made in dry goods, and Mrs. James Brown, who lives in a fine house on Park avenue and Thirty-seventh street, received from her husband's estate about $4,000,000, which he accumulated as a banker. Mrs. W. E. Dodge is worth $4,000,000, much of the income of which she sends to the heathen. Mrs. Robert Goelet is worth $2,000,000, and Mrs. John C. Green, the widow of the Princeton College patron, is reputed to be worth $20,000,000. Mrs. John Minturn is another wealthy New York widow; she is said to be worth $2,000,000, and her father was an Aspinwall. Governor Morgan's widow is worth several millions; Clarkson Potter's widow has an immense income from his estate, and Mrs. Edwin Stevens, who owns "Castle Point" at Hoboken, is one of the richest widows in America, and counts her wealth by millions. Mrs. Paran Stevens's husband made $6,000,000 in hotels and left her the Victoria and a share in the Fifth Avenue.

But after this plethora of millions feminine, who is the richest woman in New York, and consequently, without much doubt, the richest in the United States, and perhaps the richest woman in the world? She isn't young and she isn't handsome, but she made her money and keeps it. Where does "Hetty" Green live? Look in directories and you won't find out. Ask the Chemical Bank people and you might, if they thought proper to tell you. Who knows where "the richest woman in New York" lives?

She is about forty-seven years old and is worth at a conservative estimate about twenty-five million dollars. She married E. H. Green, of New York. Mr. Green was worth $700,000, and it is said Miss Hetty had an ante-nuptial contract with him whereby he agreed to pay all of the household expenses and to leave her property of $5,000,000 and more in her own name. After her wedding she kept up her activity and through her husband got into Wall street speculation. She did the speculating herself and made while her husband lost. She could buy large blocks of stock and would bull or bear the markets as she thought best. She made money right along and is now "reputed" to be worth forty-odd millions. She is economical withal, and though her income must be immense, her total household expenses are not over $5,000.

The Marriage of Jefferson.

The first marriage of Jefferson was of a somewhat romantic character. After graduating at West Point he was ordered to Fort Crawford at Prairie du Chien, Wis., the post then commanded by Col. Zachary Taylor. The young daughter of the latter, Miss Sallie Knox Taylor, at once fell desperately in love with the handsome and intellectual young lieutenant, and the affection was reciprocated, but the old Colonel was averse to any match-making under the circumstances and peremptorily forbade Davis from visiting his quarters except in an official capacity. The lovers managed to see each other by stratagem, however, and one morning at daylight they were missing. The household was aroused, the servants interrogated and a search made, but nothing was elicited save that the door of the stable was open, four horses were gone, and their tracks indicated a hasty departure. Further examination of the premises showed that Lieut. George Wilson, brother of Thomas S. Wilson, of Dubuque, Ia., and Miss Street, daughter of General Street, had suddenly disappeared. There was but one conclusion, and in less than an hour every man, woman and child in the village knew all about the runaway match.

IN THE LATE SUMMER DAYS

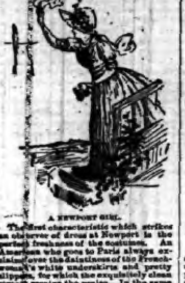
Gowns for Newport in September—What Is Worn at the Hop, on Bellevue Avenue, by the Bather, the Fisher and the Boatwoman.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

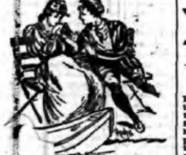
Newport is probably our closest approach to a summer capital and, outside of New York itself through which the tide of summer travel ebbs and flows continually, it is in Newport that one must study August and September gowns. Not that one may not find equally brave attire at Saratoga or Long Branch, but the proprieties of dress are not always so carefully considered as to times and seasons. Saratoga is flamboyant; it wears diamonds at breakfast very frequently. Newport is quiet to simplicity in the morning, richly elegant at dinner, and ablaze like the Queen of Sheba in the Casino. To spend September at Newport a woman need not lay out a great amount of money on an outfit necessarily, but what is bought must be correct in taste, selected by the help not only of cash but of brains.



A NEWPORT GIRL.

The first characteristic which strikes an observer of dress at Newport is the perfect freshness of the costumes. An American who goes to Paris always exclaims over the daintiness of the Frenchwoman's white underskirts and pretty slippers, for which the exquisitely clean streets receive the praise. In the same way the stranger in Newport remarks on the fair bloom of youth in the attire. Newport gowns are cherished and hence they do not wrinkle or crease or lay themselves open to any suspicion of a tumbled appearance or give the slightest evidence of travel or wear. They are carefully shaken out of window as soon as they are taken off the person; they are tenderly brushed daily with a silk handkerchief or bit of soft flannel; they are pressed with an iron as often as worn if they belong to the genus wash-gown; they are never allowed for the briefest period to want a stitch or a button, and so to become pulled or straited; they are sedulously freshened and tended by the watchful ladies' maid, or, if such a person is not included in the establishment, by the lady herself, whose business instinct for securing the worth of her money in her wardrobe is usually more acute than one finds it in women without means, who cannot easily replace what is soiled.

This exaltation of daintiness and carefulness of finish over richness of material has curious results sometimes, as when a young lady of a girlish and innocent style of beauty drove slowly along Bellevue avenue a few days since in a low phaeton drawn by a pair of horses with a stout silver bar in front to support the reins. She had dark red hair gathered in a low coil, a delicate face and a manner as simple and serene as if, instead of making part of the splendid pageant of the glittering driveway, she were picking wild flowers in the meadow. A group of women, possibly from the country, with wholesome ideas on dress extravagance, fixed admiring eyes on her charming profile and on her "sweet, simple frock" of blue gingham tinted the shades of a hazy August sky. It had a full skirt of straight breadths sewn in gathers on a piping cord at the waist, with no ornament but a deep ruffle of white lace whipped on at the bottom. The full round bodice had a yoke of white mull cut in a V point in front and behind. The blue gingham was brought across this in front in soft, lace-edged folds from either shoulder seam, the right side crossing upon the left and losing itself in a ribbon sash knotted under the left arm. The lace and gingham sleeves were puffed slightly; and a blue bullet hat was bent into a cottage poke above the flowerlike face and trimmed with a twisting vine of white clematis blossoms. The gloves, the lines by which she guided her horses, the whip, the toe of the single small boot that peeped from under the draperies, all were white and her prancing steeds had snowy white collars edged with silver.



MORNING WEAR.

"What a sensible creature," said one woman to another, "that pretty girl must be. She knows that taste goes farther than money in clothes nowadays. Why, you could match the materials of that dress for twenty-five cents a yard and make it up for your Genie, trimmings and all, for less than five dollars."

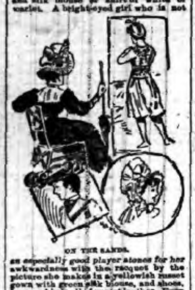
What would have been the emotions of the admirer of girlish simplicity had any gossipy fairy whispered to her that this same pretty, low-cost gown was specially imported through a fashionable New York modiste from a famous Parisian house, was built from top to bottom on silk linings and cost $150? Newport wears the cheapest cottons or batistes if it feels so minded, but as likely as not spends fortunes to secure just that touch and go unstudied effect in the making.

It will cost you a dollar to climb up into the Casino balcony at half an hour before midnight of a Friday evening but perhaps the sight of gowns, whose skirts are made by Worth and whose bodices by Tiffany may repay you for the extravagance. If you care for belles and beauties, potentates and powers, you may pick out from the hosts of girls in well-made ball dresses of white, black, pink or blue net or tulle, fair, irreproachably attired and undistinguishable. Mrs. Astor, in rose-colored white brocade starred with diamonds; Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt in pearl-colored tulle, stiff with silver embroidery; Mrs. Henry Clews in white tulle, embroidered with lilies of the valley; Mrs. August Belmont in blue crepe, Mrs. Burke Roche in pearl colored satin, with blue crepe ruchings; Mrs. Sloane in white tulle, with yellow silk sashes, and so on through the ranks of "gentle ladies richly clad" ad infinitum. Not a man on the floor but feels like singing with Robert Yokes:

"You should see my coat-tails flying
As I whirl the girls around."

If these things charm not, there may be pleasure in the sight of the diving damsels, amassed of a morning by the swimming girls. The costly and extra bathing suits that one reads about exist for the most part in the newspaper correspondents' lively imagination. There are many pretty and tasteful swimming suits, but there is no code of morality which exacts of a bather that she should make herself hideous nor is a becoming suit necessarily an immodest one. The swimming suit is usually made in somewhat different fashion from the beach suit, in which one simply wets one's toes, and the diving suit, which allows herself [illegible] midair and ocean, allows the greatest latitude of all. Those who swim choose a knickerbocker costume, with short trousers long blouse or jacket and short plaited skirt or tunic, into the hem of which pebbles are sometimes sewn to keep it from floating up about the person. The blouse is cut loose in the throat and it is seldom that any sleeves are worn. The newest bathing caps have a loose oilskin peak to protect the complexion, and swimming belts made of cork and covered with material to match the suit are becoming a very usual addition to the outfit of beginners. The bathing wrap of coarse white or gaily striped towelling is all but universal, and long stockings with cork soles, or protected by bathing slippers are, of course, indispensable. One of the prettiest swimming suits is worn by a pretty Brooklyn girl whose piquant face makes her always a conspicuous figure. It is of black silk, the trousers just reaching to the knees and the skirt a little shorter and fastened to a full sailor blouse. Yellow silk stockings, a yellow kerchief about her throat, yellow belt and cuffs and a yellow cap with a scarlet tassel add touches of vivid color.

Tennis costumes with the approach of cooler weather take to themselves new colors and new ways. The dainty grays and whites and pale greens give place to the ruddy russet hues that soon will find their parallels in the changing leaves. A russet serge is a favorite material with accordion plaited skirt and silk blouse or shirt of white or scarlet. A bright-eyed girl who is not an especially good player atones for her awkwardness with the racquet by the picture she makes in a yellowish russet gown with green silk blouse, and shoes, hose and belt all of russet leather. Even her hat is a soft green felt, with scarlet plume and russet ribbons.



ON THE SANDS.

In the boating dress much the same colors and materials obtain. Many of the girls who think nothing of a five-mile pull before breakfast wear all white in their water expeditions which is very effective as the sun glints on the dripping oars. Others wear gray-green or gray-blue serges with white silk serge blouses which will stand any amount of splashing from the salt waves or the scrubbing board of the laundrywoman. A little white Saxony cap with a black velvet visor is the regulation headwear.

The fishing gown is something which until last season had hardly a name. This fall it increases and multiplies. Some of the shrewd girls who have an eye to economy have devised a suit which is adapted at once to bathing and fishing. It consists in one typical instance of a skirt of broad stripes of green and white serge which comes just to the knees. There is a loose bodice of white serge and an overdress of scarlet serge, with shoulder straps and bretelles which is easily detachable, and when laid aside leaves the less complicated suit for bathing. As used for a crabbing outfit long scarlet stockings and corksoled green canvas shoes are worn, with a white fishing cap with scarlet tassel.

The quaintest device seen on the rocks this summer is the cape bonnet or "Heligolander," which is now worn as often by young married women as by little girls, and is made of mull, cambric or batiste to match the gown. A plump and rosy blonde, who is often seen in a pink gingham trimmed with white point de gene, tucks away her yellow curls under a light pink gingham cape bonnet, flowered in white and blue. Pale yellow batiste with full flounced cape embroidered in white, is the finish to a brunette's costume of black batiste with sash striped in white and yellow. These deep cape bonnets are great aids to flirtation, for a pretty face looks particularly childlike and innocent peeping out from under their shade.

The first gowns imported for early autumn wear are thoroughly composite in style, the Directory and Empire features being blended oddly, if in fair degree of harmony with Russian, Louis Phillippe, Valois, Venetian and Greek elements. Girdles, sashes, vests, redingote shapes, classic draperies and the like will continue their reign.

WOMEN AS PHYSICIANS.

What Becomes of the Girl Students of Medicine.

A Field in Which Women are Doing Useful Work and Acquiring Both Cash and Fame—The Woman Doctor in New York and Elsewhere.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

The service rendered by Dr. Sophia Fendler Unger as Sanitary Inspector to the New York Board of Health during the midsummer months has called attention to the multiplication and the high professional standing of women physicians. There are about 150 of these in regular practice in New York; and Brooklyn has a corresponding proportion. Philadelphia and Boston come next in the numbers supported, the City of Brotherly Love having 100 or thereabouts and the Hub, if one includes the circle of widesawake towns within the radius of its spokes, almost as many. Next year's census will probably show a population of 3,100 or 3,200 women doctors in the North, the Middle States and the West; Dixie land, if one excepts the Virginias and Maryland having been invaded only within a very few years and in slim force by the advance guard.

It is now thirty-eight years since Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell one of the well known family of sisters, established herself in New York as the first qualified woman physician. Dr. Blackwell was the first woman not only in the city but in America or England to graduate in medicine, a noteworthy event of the year 1849 having been the appearance at a course of medical lectures of a young woman student whom the vivacious Baltimore "Sun" advised to confine her practice to "diseases of the heart" and whom the Boston "Medical Journal" spoke of as a pretty "little specimen of the feminine gender, reporting her age as 26. She comes into the class with great composure, takes off her bonnet and puts it under the seat, exposing a fine phrenology." Two years after Dr. Elizabeth, who has lived how many years abroad, graduated her sister, Dr. Emily Blackwell, and through their joint efforts was founded in 1853, as a practical school for instruction of women studying medicine, the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, followed in 1868 by the Women's Medical College. Five years earlier than this, in 1863, Dr. Clemence Lozier had founded a homeopathic medical college for women which sent out as its first graduate Dr. Emily Schetine in 1864.

To earn a diploma in medicine in those days required abundant capital of fortitude and energy, but now when it has become comparatively easy for a woman to qualify as a doctor it is probable that in many cases the profession offers the best opportunities to an educated woman of any work that is open to her. Her chances for usefulness among women, an increasing proportion of whom are yearly coming to prefer to be treated by their own sex, hold out probably the main inducement, and yet the financial prospect of the case is not unpleasing. Some years ago there was published an average of the annual incomes of seventy-six graduates of the Pennsylvania Women's Medical College. It was hard on the heels of $4,000. It is safe to say that in few other businesses would women make so good a showing. Four of the seventy-six were in receipt of sums ranging above $15,000. Ten confessed that they earned less than $1,000. The great majority mentioned figures ranging between $2,000 and $5,000. A woman physician in good practice in New York, when asked to name a figure that might fairly represent the income to be expected by a young doctor during her first or second year in the city, was inclined to fix on $500 to $800. This is as good a start probably as would be expected by the graduate of the opposite sex. The fees of the woman doctor per visit are about the same as those of her brethren, and though there are no women who receive anything like the sums exacted by the great specialists, $25, $50 or even $50 is a charge that is occasionally made for a few minutes' attention by a few of the foremost women practitioners of New York, Philadelphia and Chicago. Comparatively few properly qualified women doctors fail to find themselves able to support a modest menage by the time they have been three or four years out of school. The largest income received from fees by any woman doctor in Boston is said to be something less than $20,000. The highest figure quoted for Philadelphia is $15,000. The top notch in New York is $25,000, and $15,000 is earned in all probability by quite a number, all told.

The cost of a medical education does not differ greatly from that of three years of an ordinary college course, the tuition averaging in the New York colleges a trifle over $100 a year, to which, of course, is to be added whatever one chooses to pay for boarding and lodging. The allopathic and the homeopathic colleges have each a hospital specially attached where the students receive practical bedside instruction, and all the city dispensaries with their clinics are open to women. The Bellevue Hospital clinical lectures are also open, as well as lectures and surgical operations at the New York Hospital, the Presbyterian Hospital, the Mt. Sinai Hospital, the New York Eye and Ear Infirmary and the Manhattan Eye and Ear Infirmary. The New York and the Kings County Medical Societies admit women, and other special medical societies such as the American and New York Neurological Societies and the American Society for Physical Research take them in. One or two hospitals both in New York and Brooklyn have women among their resident physicians or in charge of lying in wards. In Brooklyn the Lucretia Mott Hospital was founded by a woman physician and is officered by women. One special department in which the services of women physicians are being called for is the rapidly multiplying clubs of the working girls, who show their common sense by setting aside almost the first dues collected by their organizations to secure the attendance of women physicians on stated evenings weekly.

The woman graduate of the medical schools averages somewhat younger now than she did a dozen years ago. The ranks of the doctors were recruited largely in the earlier years from worn out school teachers tired of that occupation, but now it is fresh and blooming alumnae of the colleges who are knocking at the doors of the professional schools. No student is graduated under the age of twenty-one, but this admits to the Junior classes the slender girl of eighteen, who trembles at the prospect of two to six hours daily in the dissecting room. Side by side with her works, very possibly, her mother, who has lived through the joys and sorrows of half a century and wears widows' weeds. An appreciable portion of the students are the daughters of practicing physicians and in quite a number of instances doctors have sent their wives that they might take them into professional partnership at the end of the course. Twenty-seven years is about the average age at which the budding doctor says good-bye to her preceptor and her dean and steps out into the world a full-fledged M. D., and every year the number of students is decreasing who have seen above three decades, this fact auguring well for the permanent usefulness of the woman physician.

Most of the women now practicing make specialties of gynecology, obstetrics and the diseases of women and children. Now and then a woman develops talent as a surgeon, but while a few have performed really important operations it is not often that the opportunity to do so comes in their way. Dr. Elizabeth Cushier was the first successful ovariotomist among women physicians. A majority of the operations of general surgery are performed on men and these naturally do not fall within the province of a woman doctor. Quite a number of women have made reputations in the treatment of nervous and mental disorders, and there seems to be a field in the future in specialties where dexterity and delicate manipulation are required, as in diseases of the throat, the eye and the ear. Several women have won respectful attention as medical writers. Dr. Grace Peckham and Dr. Lucy M. Hall finding ready hearing. Dr. Dejerine-Klumpke, who is an American though married in France, has written several standard works on nervous pathology.

Of women who become doctors statistics seem to show that about one in five will marry. Of the number whose troth is not plighted to their profession so singly but that they put on the wedding ring, only 3 or 4 per cent. retire from practice on marriage, and nearly 60 per cent. marry doctors whose active partners they become. Brooklyn furnishes several examples of married doctors whose home lives prove that matrimony is not necessarily a failure when the wife, instead of stitching her life into embroidered doylies, practices medicine. Dr. Mary Wattles-Faunce, for example, who has so worthily filled the chair of anatomy at the Woman's Medical College of the New York Infirmary, has three or four chubby rosy-cheeked children doting about the daintiest of home.

A leading woman physician in New York who has been in practice for twenty years, when questioned as to the effect of medical practice on the health of women, said that as a rule improvement rather than degeneracy followed. The rate of mortality is low among women doctors and not many have been compelled to retire owing to inability to stand the strain. Where a breakdown has resulted investigation would often find its cause in the overconscientiousness of the doctor who took her patients' ailments as much to heart as if they had been members of her own family, notably in the case of a pretty little blonde who when called to a house containing three typhus fever cases constituted herself nurse as well as doctor, insisted on preparing the food and watching by the bedsides, saved her patients, but took the fever herself, and was a couple of years in reaching full health and strength again. Where the devotion to duty is not necessarily morbid, the women doctor submits to being routed out of bed at midnight in a howling March blizzard and to spending days and nights in journeying from sick room to sick room with surprising equanimity, growing rosy and plump under the discipline, and taking much joy in her sleek horse and colored coachman. Many married women who have become doctors have found their knowledge of incalculable value in the rearing of their children.

Among New York physicians, the statistics of the lying in wards of the New York Infant Asylum, under the charge of Dr. Kate Parker as resident physician, made the best record. Drs. Sarah E. Post, Annie S. Daniel and Gertrude B. Kelly are all of the Alumnae Association of the College of the New York Infirmary. Dr. Post is an inventor whose attachments to medical electrical machines have been found of value to the profession. Dr. Daniel has been the out visitor of the infirmary and during the summer months, when the infant mortality mounts up to half the death rate of the city, the dwellers in the tenement districts have found her a staunch and intelligent friend, and her acquaintance with their needs has prompted the State Charities Association to make frequent calls on her for advice and information. Dr. Kelly is a clever young doctor and thinker on social topics. Dr. Emily Blackwell is the Dean of the Women's Medical College and a woman with a wide range of influence. Her house is the one office made the scene of New York by the Cary sisters, Alice and Phoebe. Dr. Mary T. Bissell is sister of the President of Vassar and has done much for the cause of physical culture among women by her gymnasium and by the able pen she wields. Dr. Josephine Chevalier is an excellent chemist, and Drs. Sarah and Julia McNutt, Dr. Eleanor Kilham, Dr. Josephine Walter, Dr. Mary S. West and scores more have found that the world has room for them and makes place cordially for their work. The death of Dr. Clemence Lozier showed how deep can be the void left by the loss of a woman physician. In Brooklyn Dr. Belle M. Rankin, Dr. Baker, Drs. Elisha M. Mosher and Lucy M. Hall, who work together in a partnership that only of late would have been counted possible to women, and who have been Superintendent of the Woman's Reformatory at Sherborne, Mass., and later resident physicians to Vassar College, with many others have done hard working and brilliant service.

ELIZA PUTNAM HEATON.

THE DOINGS OF WOMEN FOLK.

The unusually rainy summer has produced a curious result in giving some of the spring flowers a second season of blossoming and hastening the opening of the autumn posies, so that the unusual spectacle has been presented in places of May dandelions and October chrysanthemums blooming side by side. A chrysanthemum party was given at aristocratic Nahant on the rocky Massachusetts coast some days since to welcome the great golden early comers, and as the fete was quite a novel one it is likely to be imitated both on a larger and smaller scale at Lenox and elsewhere during the autumn. The cards of invitation which were sent out were bordered with pale purple chrysanthemums like so many giant thistles or like bunches of willow plumes. The guests, who reached Lynn, the nearest railway station, by special train, were met by carts decked with green boughs, with now and then a maple branch waving twigs of the deepest crimson. White and red china asters were stuck behind the horses' ears. A combination musicale and garden party was the entertainment of the afternoon. The decorations of the large hall and the music rooms were chrysanthemums, eked out, for lack of the fuller bloom of coming weeks, by their first cousins the gorgeous chinaasters. Quaint, dark Egyptian-like vases were filled with brown and red or dull orange blossoms; low antique blue bowls contained those that were pure golden or pale yellow with crimson blotches on the under sides, while marble vases held tall stalks unfolding in lilac and bluish pink and soft cerise. Upon the lawn the same idea was carried out, chrysanthemums and asters in pots just removed from the gardeners' beds, being ranged in double and quadruple rows to border paths leading to the tents in which tea was served. The plants had each a dozen or more great heavy-petalled blossoms, while huge boquets of buds spoke of the approaching success of the florist's forcing. Under the tent awnings the whole middle of the tea table was a rectangle of white asters set erect as if growing. By each plate lay two or three long-stemmed sprays of chrysanthemums, a dull red half shading into yellow, being followed by white and this by deepest gold. These sprays were tied by ribbons and, matching them, the name cards were painted with nymphs and graces sporting among tall bushes of chrysanthemums.

Some of the guests of the cottages in a village of the Berkshires, have been interested this summer in the appearance of a young girl who has alighted from a farmer's "carryall" occasionally to deliver berries for tea. Tall, straight, brown-curled and somewhat sunburned, she had such large eyes, such a prettily curved mouth, such winsome ways and such a sweet-toned voice that more than one felt a passing impulse to inquire into her history and see if some of the things, which people call "advantages," could not be thrown in her way. Last week there came to one of the cottages another young girl who cried: "Oh! Isabel," when she caught sight of the berry picker, "is this why you couldn't find time to join the coaching party to the White Mountains or even to write a line to your friends?" Diligent inquiry on the part of the cottagers, brought out the fact that Isabel is a Wellesly girl whose father has found life for a year or two back somewhat hard sledding and who has organized quite an industry this vacation to help pay her bills during the next school year. All berries, in their season, she has picked and hired a dozen or more boys and girls to pick for her. These she has retailed to cottagers, shipped to New York and Springfield, and when a surplus has threatened to accumulate has put up her wild fruit in cans. So long as the wild strawberries lasted she tempted customers with the woodsy bits of deliciousness in birch bark baskets or dishes platted of oak leaves. Feathery grasses, sweet fern and bayberry, blossoms of the wild carrot, cardinal flowers and clematis she has tied up in graceful bunches and sent cityward along with her berry spoils. As the result of her summer's work she is round and ruddy, and has money enough in pocket to go a long way toward books and tuition fees.

The talk of a college of domestic economy to turn out trained and certificated servants and housekeepers is revived. This time rumor, perhaps on no authority whatever, places the projected institution under the joint patronage of Mrs. Whitney and Mrs. Cleveland. As discussed a couple of years ago Mrs. Whitney was said to be interested actively and Miss Juliet Corson was spoken of as a fitting head for the school. The plan, however, ended in moonshine, but the difficulties of housewives so increase and multiply that undaunted it bobs up serenely once more. Dame Rumor is quite definite this time, even entering into particulars. A house is to be taken in a convenient location and strenuous efforts are to be made to elevate housekeeping to the rank of a profession for women by providing well-considered courses of instruction and awarding diplomas on graduation in the hope of inducing intelligent American girls to prefer well-ordered kitchens to the factory or to standing room behind the counter. In addition to the cooking classes and to practical work in every department of household tasks, there will be, so talk has it, an advanced course including lectures on the chemistry of cooking, the relative values of foods, house hygenie and sanitation including ventilation and such knowledge of plumbing and draining as is useful to the housekeeper, and various branches of domestic economy adapted to the intelligent management of homes. Graduates, it is expected, will be able to secure better wages than the average in families able to appreciate and to pay for brains as well as muscle, and the tendency will be to elevate the standard of housework and to narrow the field of the green girl fresh from Castle Garden. Quite a number of prominent women besides Mrs. Cleveland, will, it is said, allow the use of their names as patronesses, and it is hoped that at least in the millennium household service may stand on a footing as satisfactory and dignified as is now the plane which the trained nurse occupies.

A girl in a canoe is often of a pleasant afternoon one of the features of the Hudson, between upper New York and Yonkers. The canoe is what woodsmen would call a decked "bucktail," being twenty-six inches wide by about ten and a half feet long, decked over at both ends and weighing probably not over twenty pounds. This cockle shell is one of the prettiest things afloat, with its thin sides of polished cedar and its bright-eyed occupant seated on a scarlet cushion on its bottom. She has scarlet ribbons on her sailor hat and a scarlet sash fastened about the waist of her dark blue serge boating gown. A heavy silk shirt of dark blue and white stripes tops this and as she wields the long double paddle she skims the surface of the dimpling river with the lightness and bird-like motion that only a canoeist knows. She is an expert sailor lass and her boat dips and ducks with all possible grace to the steamer swells.

Four fat women met in a Turkish bath one day recently. As robed in sheets they stepped one after another upon the scales they tipped the beam at 216, 200, 195 and 186 pounds respectively. It turned out that all were regular frequenters of the place and that they were discouraged because the perspiration of the hot room did not make them thin. Who says we are still a cadaverous people?

SHOES OF HUMAN SKIN.

A Chicago Shoe-Maker Makes Them to Order.

An Enterprising Reporter Is Measured for a Pair and Has an Interesting Conversation with the Dealer in Human Leather.

It has been whispered around that Mr. William Gee could and would make shoes that were more reliable than any to be had in Chicago, and Mr. Gee when approached admitted that it was so.

"They'll never crack on the sides, and they'll never wear out. They are most elastic and shape themselves to the foot so that there can be no possible trouble from misfits."

"I believe I'll get a pair," said the reporter.

"That's right," said Mr. Gee. "You'll never regret it. They'll wear you forever and will fit like moccasins. One doctor I know has a pair of slippers that he has worn seven years, and they're good for another seven. I haven't much left, but I have the skin of one white woman here. I suppose you'd rather have that than a negro's skin."

It was somewhat startling, and if the reporter had not had a warning as to what to expect, he would probably have been flurried.

Mr. William Gee sells shoes made from the skin of human beings.

He has done it quietly for some time, and is now making a pair of low shoes from the skin taken, according to his own story, from the leg of a woman. Of course Mr. Gee does not advertise the fact that he makes shoes from human skin, but some of his patrons have been told that they could have some of these "extremely durable shoes" if desired.

These facts were in possession of a Chicago Tribune man, so he promptly replied that he preferred the skin of a white woman. Mr. Gee took a parcel of yellow leather from a case and said:

"Here it is. It is the last white woman's I have. It is pretty hard to get it now."

"Why?" asked the reporter as he felt of the leather.

"Well, it's hard to get it tanned," replied Mr. Gee. "We used to send it out as pig-skin, but before tanning it is too easily distinguished, and tanners are superstitious. I can get the skins easier than I can get them tanned."

"How do you get the skins?"

"I know a man who used to be a medical student and he supplies them to me. He's a practicing physician now."

A question as to who the medical man was seemed to make Mr. Gee suspicious and the matter was dropped for a moment while the reporter's foot was being measured.

"What are the peculiar advantages of human skins?" ventured the reporter after awhile.

"It never wears out," replied Mr. Gee, "and it never cracks. It is the most durable of any leather. You can wear it for years. It stretches well, too, and is a most comfortable shoe."

"Do you make many?"

"No. I haven't had much to do lately. You see it isn't generally known, and then I find it hard to get the skins tanned now."

"Where are they tanned?"

Mr. Gee evaded the question.

Several hours later the Tribune man called again and suggested that the skin was not human skin at all, but that deceit had been attempted. On this call a young woman was working at a machine near the front of the store. Her material was apparently from the same piece of leather that the reporter had seen earlier in the day.

"If any one wants to bet that this is not human skin," said Mr. Gee, "tell me what the amount is and I will put it up and furnish the proof. I can prove it by the doctor who got it for me and by the tanners."

He declined, however, to give the names of either, "unless there is something to be gained by it, you know."

"I would like to know, though," said the reporter, "if that is surely from a human body."

The girl at the machine made some sort of an exclamation, and Mr. Gee remarked:

"She hates to work on it."

Then he brought out the skin that he had shown in the morning, unrolled it, and laid it along his body. There had been two pieces cut out.

"You see," he said, as he smoothed it out, "it is a portion of a woman's skin. It runs from the neck nearly to the ankle. One of your shoes"—and he showed the place—"was cut from the breast, and the other"—another illustration—"from the leg."

In both places leather had been cut out to all appearances for a shoe, and the piece he exhibited had every indication of having been originally fitted to that portion of the anatomy he described. To make the matter doubly sure he brought out another piece of skin.

"This is a negro's," he said. "It's taken from his side just under the arm. You can see how thin it is under the arm, and how it gets thicker further down." The matter was demonstrated as he went along.

Going out the reporter asked the girl at the machine how she liked working on leather made from human skin.

"I don't like it," she said, "but then there is no reason to complain now. It doesn't smell."

"Did it at first?"

"Did it!" Her nose went up. "When the sachel first came here—"

"The skin came in a sachel, then?"

"Yes."

"It wasn't tanned?"

"No."

"I have it all tanned myself," said Mr. Gee. "The skin is brought to me and then I have it tanned. That's my greatest trouble."

CURIOUS EXPERIMENT.

How an Editor Arrived at a Conclusion Concerning His Own Production.

Speaking of editors, the case of the editor who wants to contribute an article to some other periodical than his own—a magazine, for instance—is a curious one. For the time being he puts himself in the place of a contributor and feels the pangs of a timid author. The Boston Transcript listener once knew a newspaper editor who was inspired to write an article of a light and entertaining character, suitable for a magazine. He wrote it in his odd moments, and then set to speculating as to whether it had any particular value. It seemed to him that it had, but the reflection that he might be prejudiced in its favor troubled him. He had had precisely the same feeling when somebody had brought him an article that he wanted to judge favorably. How was he to get his own impartial judgment on his own article? He thought about it some time, and finally decided that the only way to get the necessary conditions was to send himself the article through the mail, to receive it with other contributions, and to treat it all the way through as if it were somebody else's.

The plan worked to a charm. The editor wrote a little note to himself to accompany the article, inclosed stamps for a reply or a return of the manuscript, and mailed the whole at the post-office. Toward the close of the day, when the editor was near the end of a lot of wearisome communications, and had got himself into the declining mood that comes with fatigue, his article arrived. After he had allowed it to lie around a while, he broke the seal and read it. Then he took a little slip, wrote on it reflectively, inclosed it with the manuscript in a big envelope, stuck on the stamp, sealed the envelope and put it into the department marked "post-office" in the tin box that hung by the side of his desk. Next morning he received the parcel back, and read with breathless interest this note, which accompanied the manuscript:

"Unavailable. Too discursive and trivial in its tone. Should have been elaborated with more care. Many passages not needed in the presentation of the idea. Contains promise, however; author is advised to try again."

His Own Grandfather.

Medical Classics tells of a case where a fellow got to be his own grandfather. It says: There was a widow and her daughter-in-law and a man and his son. The widow married the son, and the daughter married "the old man." The widow was, therefore, mother to her husband's father, and consequently grandmother to her own husband. They had a son, to whom she was great-grandmother. Now, as the son of a great-grandmother must be either a grandfather or a great-uncle, this boy was one or the other. He was his own grandfather.

He Was Ready to Repent.

Wife—Why, John, you don't mean to say that you swore, do you? Then I want you to repent of it, darling, and never do so again. Husband—I have repented, wife, and I'll never do so again. You see, I swore off from drinking.

THE FLAG.

The proposed national exhibition to be held in this country three years hence to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus is a well conceived idea, and we hope it will realize merited success.

But, the query arises, will our national flag be then unfurled? Will the glorious emblem of our nationality float in rightful supremacy?

On the land it will most assuredly, but how about the broad ocean, the watery highway of nations, along which the adventurous Genoese navigator, with both faith and anxiety, steered his caravels to secure for civilization and commercial enterprise a new world?

How many of the visiting throngs from over the sea that may be expected to reach our shores in 1892 will be voyaging beneath the protecting folds of the flag of the United States?

None, unless the suicidal and antiquated Chinese policy we have adopted and pursued be changed into nineteenth century enlightenment.

The ensigns of England, France, Germany, Italy and even of imbecile Spain will wave in proud majesty over fleets of incoming and out-going steamers, as they do now, but the stars and stripes will not be visible among them.

What a humiliating fact!

The American flag, once only second in the wealth achieving race for commercial ascendancy, virtually banished from the seas because of our own blind stupidity.

We as a people boast of superior intelligence.

Boasting is frequently akin to [illegible] bombast.

Truth attested results tell the tale.

If we desire to visit Europe, and thousands go there every year, a foreign [illegible] steamer is our only means of conveyance. We raise immense quantities of cotton, wheat and corn for export and with pleasurable emotion hand the freight profits over to ship-owning foreigners.

Then wrapping a piece of starry bunting around our precious bodies we shout "Protection forever to American industry," forgetting or ignoring the great fact, that since the time of Columbus that species of home industry has augmented the wealth of nations equal to that of ocean commerce, which our marvelous intelligence has protected nearly out of existence.

There is no valid reason why the United States should not stand first in the productions of earth, first in manufactures of all kinds, and first in globe expanded commerce.

When statesmen supplant demagogues, the public good out-ranks mercenary interests, legislators learn the rudiments of practical business, and patriotism irrespective of partisan name, puts grovelling politics to the wall, the star of American glory will shine over an [illegible] and prosperous land.

Not until then.

North Plainfield Democratic Primary.

At the Democratic primary in North Plainfield, last Friday, to elect delegates to the Gubernatorial Convention to be held at Trenton, Tuesday, Sept. [illegible] inst., the following officers were elected: David J. Carney, Chairman; E. C. M[illegible], Secretary; John H. Jackson and [illegible] H. Carney, Delegates to Convention. The delegates were given power to fill vacancies and upon motion of Mr. E. C. M[illegible] were instructed to cast their ballots for Leon Abbett.

The Removal of the C. L. S. C. Will Effect Many.

The announcement exclusively published in THE PRESS of Sept. 3, that the business offices of the C. L. S. C. for so many years established by this [illegible] were to be removed to Buffalo, was a thorough surprise to everyone. Such a move had not been "foreshadowed" by anything nor anybody, and would not have been believed even by those affected had it not been so stated in THE PRESS.

Some still think that the orders from headquarters may be changed, but this is not so. The matter was finally decided after a thorough consideration by the Board of Trustees, and already preparations for the change are being made, so that before next Spring the removal will have been accomplished. Buffalo is nearer Chautauqua itself, besides being the home, probably for life, of the [illegible] of the Circle, Bishop Vincent.

The architect of the Y. M. C. A. building was arranging in his plans for the offices of the C. L. S. C., and on the morning of the very day THE PRESS announced the removal, he called to see Miss Kimball regarding the rooms. The plans of the Y. M. C. A. will thus be changed, the post office business will be greatly lessened, and in many ways a large number of the community will be indirectly affected.

(From the New York [illegible])

When you can make men virtuous, [illegible] and temperate by statute, [illegible] you will have taken a long [illegible] backward; towards the days when people were considered to be only [illegible] of some ruling [illegible], not capable of thinking for themselves, and throwing [illegible] responsibility on the shoulders of the priests. Even the [illegible] radical exponents of the cold-water [illegible] are beginning to see that prohibition is the worst enemy of temperance. They are trying local option now in Plainfield, N. J., and the best element of the [illegible] and the heaviest taxpayers are [illegible] sick of it. The thousands of dollars [illegible] used to come from the licenses of [illegible] and saloons now come from the [illegible] of the people. Instead of thirty licensed saloons and hotels there are [illegible] more than sixty—paying no license [illegible] doing a flourishing trade. And drunkenness flourishes too.

While men are human they will drink, and the best the law can do is to see [illegible] no unnecessary temptation is thrown in their way. Plainfield would [illegible] be better off, both financially and morally, with a license, say of $1,000, than with local option. At this rate, we [illegible] able hotels and saloons, holding the licenses under strict conditions and good order, would pay the required sum, and it would be to the [illegible] the licensees to see that no [illegible] [illegible] business was done. There [illegible] no more discontent [illegible] than Mr. Bradley, of Asbury Park, [illegible] even he admits now that high [illegible] better than prohibition.

A good many grangers seem to labor under the delusion that a farmer must put up signs against trespassing if he would enforce the penalty. A much better delusion to labor under is that a farmer owns his property and that it would be the proper thing to go and ask permission to tramp over a farm. The granger would think the farmer very rude if he were to come tramping through his house without asking permission, and what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

To THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—I have read with interest your articles on Westfield and your replies to the Editor of the Standard. The only trouble with that esteemed contemporary is that "he bites off more than he can chew."

The first bite was the school question, and it sticks in the "editorial throat" yet; also the "electric light" and "borough government." So, what the three, with other morsels not quite so prominent, it makes quite a mouthful. The aged editor must also see that his shoes are blacked—"shaft the shaft," as he has earnestly urged his young readers to be particular about; and it has pained me considerably to notice on a number of occasions that there has been a lack of polish on that part of his costume, which does not accord with the advice so freely given.

Go slow, Mr. Standard, and don't try and get ahead of the procession. The funeral is not all yours, and will get there if you will only keep in the ranks and not try and head off the hearse.

ROY, JR.

A Young Man Who Wears Corsets With Pleasure and Comfort.

A gentleman residing in this city and connected with the New York office of one of the largest corset manufactories in the World, permitted a PRESS reporter to see the following letter recently received by his firm, from Rotterdam. It will probably entertain the public in general:

GENTLEMEN,—I write to find if you ever make to measure corsets for gentlemen's wear, and if so your prices for same.

I formed the habit of wearing corsets while yet a child and at school in Italy. While there we were always led to believe that it was the correct way and were always encouraged to lace them as snugly as we could. As a result of this quite a number of the students while yet under 15 years cultivated very elegant and stylish figures, some of us not measuring more than 18 English inches at the waist. And I must say that a few of the students had the most lovely and graceful tapering waists I have ever seen anywhere.

When I left the school I soon found that it was not the custom for gentlemen to wear corsets so tightly laced as we had been taught, and then tried to give up the practice, but the habit so carefully followed for 5 years was firmly fixed and after every attempt to leave off my corsets I have always returned to them with pleasure and comfort.

I am now wearing a French C. P. long waist corset, 20 inch waist, but it is a poor fit at the bust, and so as I am about to visit the States I would like to call on you and get suitable ones made if you can accommodate me.

If you cannot do so could you direct me to some first class maker who could.

The prospects for Fall shooting along the beaches of Southern New Jersey were never known to be more favorable than now. September is the month to test the sportsman's mettle and skill, and with perseverance he is sure to return home laden with small game. Owing to the wet season there are more rabbits than have been seen for years, and quail are equally as plentiful. This is specially so in and about Monmouth county. The swamps are full of water, the birds have hatched their young, and the rabbits have selected their breeding places on high ground.

It is a great many seasons since so many field plover have visited New Jersey, especially in the lower counties. About Atlantic City the fields are reported full of them, and many of them have been shot in Monmouth county. A novel way to shoot these birds is from vehicles. A man driving about in a light wagon can approach within a few yards of this game bird, where they will flee at the approach of a man on foot fifty or a hundred yards away. In Shrewsbury township and about Long Branch some ball-head plover have been shot. When raised, it is usual for the first shot to be fired at a flock, when the remainder of the flock will circle about and return to the same place where the bird is supposed to be feeding.

While the upland birds are more plentiful than they have been for many seasons, yellow legs and other summer birds are being found in large and numerous flocks from Atlantic City to Sandy Hook. Along the Shrewsbury River snipe are being shot from rowboats, and in some sections from the piazzas of dwellings. Old sportsmen predict that reed birds are going to be very numerous. The season opened on Sept. 1, and a number have already been shot by persons gunning after blackbirds. The reeds are rank and full of seeds—a good sign—and everything looks favorable for a successful season of shooting. The time for marsh hens opened Aug. 25, a week earlier than usual. Gunners report that blackbirds are very scarce as compared with last season at this time, and in and about Monmouth county have been almost exterminated since the [illegible] of last year, which killed millions of them.

The Wilson snipe, robin snipe, yellow legs and curlews are now in good flight and are being shot in large numbers. The Autumnal flight of plover will soon take place and the tell-tales will shortly be along. There is no law against shooting these birds in New Jersey and one only needs plenty of ammunition, a good aim and the disposition and endurance to tramp over the marshes and along the beaches, and the ability to handle a gunning skiff.

The best shooting of this kind is to be found about Sandy Hook and along the grassy region at the mouth of the Shrewsbury River, off the Highlands, and the marshes at the head near Newtown Springs, where John Sheehan, a well-known gunner of Red Bank, has purchased a large tract of land on the river bank, where he will locate his shooting box.

Better gunning at this time of the year cannot be found anywhere along the coast than in the vicinity of Atlantic City, Great Egg Harbor, Brassy Bay and Brigantine. The salt beach of the latter place is a favorite feeding ground for the robin-breasts, as they are generally called by New York gunners, or robin snipe as they are known to local sportsmen. There is an old hunter, who annually visits this favorite shooting spot, who says that for fifteen years he has shot robin-snipe on Brigantine from behind a blind near the old Wright House before daybreak, catching a bead on their plump bodies only when the white crest of a breaker flashed in the background, throwing up the bird like unto a spot on a white target.

The season for ducks will not open until November 1, next year, and as the closed season of the three years will increase the large game wonderfully, the prospects of duck shooting then are good. Many broods of these animals have been found this season as far North as Wading River and [illegible] in Atlantic county [illegible] are noticeable about Weymouth, Buena Vista and Dougherty, while in Cumberland county many broods are seen.

For extra sport in wing shot the gunner must visit Grassy and Barnegat Bay, which are [illegible] of Atlantic City and Toms River. At these places wild duck and geese are found in large numbers. English snipe may be shot between Oct. 1 and Dec. 15. Woodcock shooting will begin again on Oct. 1 and will last till Dec. 1.

—A handsome flag was unfurled to the breeze at the Washington school building on Monday morning.

Reform Hall.

There was a very encouraging attendance in Reform Hall Sunday night, notwithstanding the numerous attractions elsewhere. Vice President Harper presided, Mr. Cleaver officiated as Chaplain, and a fine selection of music was rendered by a full choir led by Mr. Vanderbeek.

Interesting and appropriate remarks were made by Messrs Eden Boice, George M. Angleman and George W. F. Randolph. The speakers all bore convincing testimony against the liquor evil and on behalf of the ennobling and saving cause of temperance. They were listened to with close attention.

After a few well-timed words from Mr. Cleaver in favor of the pledge, the meeting closed with the benediction.

A Handsome Monument of Granite Which is Being Erected in Hillside Cemetery.

Ex-Councilman L. W. Serrell, of West Front street, is erecting in his plot in the Hillside cemetery, a handsome family monument of granite. The monument, which consists of three separate stones, and weighs in the aggregate about fourteen tons, was furnished by C. E. Tayntor & Co., of New York. There are also four corner stones of granite, and a foot stone. The bottom piece or base of the monument weighs about six tons, and it required the combined strength of five horses to haul the stone to the cemetery. The monument occupies a prominent position in Mr. Serrell's family plot, which adjoins the plot of Mr. C. Potter, Jr., and can be seen for a long distance. The total cost will reach somewhere up in the thousands.

HOODOOED HARKINS.

The New Brunswick Fredonian in speaking of last Saturday's game at Somerville, said: "At the end of the game Harkins was presented with a handsome bouquet by a lady admirer."

The truth of that little episode is that the bouquet was presented him in the very first inning of the game by some homely looking man who so hoodooed Harkins that he immediately struck out. In the words of that immortal song THE PRESS has already quoted:

Three hundred eyes were on him as he rubbed his hands with dirt;
One hundred tongues applauded when he wiped them on his shirt.
Then while the writhing pitcher ground the ball into his hip,
Defiance gleamed in Harkins' eye, a sneer curled Harkins' lip.
And now the leather-covered sphere came hurtling through the air,
And Harkins stood a-watching it in haughty grandeur there.
Close by the sturdy batsman the ball unheeded sped—
"That ain't my style," said Harkins, "Strike one," the umpire said.
From the benches, black with people, there went up a muffled roar
Like the beating of the storm waves on a stern and distant shore.
"Kill the umpire! Give us Bradley!" shouted some one on the stand;
And it's likely they'd have killed him had not Harkins raised his hand.
With a smile of Christian charity great Harkins' visage shone;
He stilled the rising tumult, he bade the game go on;
He signalled to the pitcher, and once more the spheroid flew;
But Harkins still ignored it, and the doctor said, "Strike two."
"Fraud!" cried the maddened hundreds, and echo answered "Fraud!"
But one scornful look from Harkins and the audience was awed.
They saw his face grow stern and cold, they saw his muscles strain,
And they knew that Harkins wouldn't let that ball go by again.
The sneer is gone from Harkins' lip, his teeth are clinched in hate;
He pounds with cruel violence his bat upon the plate.
And now Walt Currie holds the ball, and now he lets it go—
But the air alone was shattered by the force of Harkins' blow.

Public School Matters.

The members of the City Board of Education met in regular session Tuesday evening, with Pres't Jacob Kirkner in the chair. The other members present were J. W. Murray and L. F. Wadsworth. The clerk read the minutes of the July meeting and they were approved as read.

The following claims were presented and ordered paid when properly audited, those marked with a star (*) indicating that they were referred for investigation and certification:

P. Hoagland, $9*; Times Printing and Publishing Co., $3.90; Spencer Conway, $25*; A. D. Cook & Bro., $41.99; Spencer Conway, $9.50; Holmes Express, $5.30; J. C. Pierson, $1.08*; Field & Randolph, $2.50*; N. Y. & N. J. Tel. Co., $40; W. F. Adams, $13.10; John Brown, $25; Estate of D. J. Boice, $10.60; A. W. Rand, $6.50; Woolston & Buckle, $183 and $342; Chas. H. Rusk, $1,150; Plainfield Evening News, $5.50; Chas. M. Raybert, $6.50; J. P. Emmons, $97.60; W. C. Ayers, $71.96; J. P. Laire & Co., $6.06; A. Swaim, $36.19*; J. T. Odam, $62.75; W. C. Ayers, $19.35; A. S. Barnes & Co., $130.12*.

Tax Collector Johnson reported the following collection of school taxes for the past three months: June, $272.50; July, $567.60; August, $519.35.

Upon resolution adopted the janitors of the various schools were re-appointed at the same compensation as last year.

Mr. Murray stated that the accounts for the fiscal year were all in, and Mr. Wadsworth and himself were appointed a committee to prepare a statement for the public.

A resolution was adopted to the effect that all pupils entering school must take the regular course of studies, except upon presentation of a certificate from a physician showing that the scholar is physically incapable of attending all day sessions.

Several communications were received from parents who desired to have their children transferred from one school to another, and they were either referred or sent back. One of these communications was from Mr. W. D. W. Miller, and Secretary Wadsworth has replied to it as follows:

W. D. W. Miller, Esq.:

DEAR SIR:—Your communication to Mr. Kirkner, President, was considered by the Board of Education, last evening.

Certain lines have been established to determine what school each pupil shall attend, and those in which your residence is situated, show that your son should be a pupil at the Bryant building.

Many persons have a preference for a particular teacher, and make application for transfers. The Board are satisfied that the granting of such requests will be productive of serious injury.

They have therefore resolved that children residing within the lines established for their grade must attend the school building situated therein, unless there shall be such physical inability as to induce the board to permit them to attend the school nearest to their place of residence.

(Signed)
LOUIS F. WADSWORTH, Sec'y.

Acting Principal Goodrich reported some suggestions made at the last teachers' meeting to relieve and advance certain grades in the Bryant and Franklin school, namely: the third, fourth and sub-primary grades. Children in these grades living on and between Plainfield avenue and Arlington avenue will hereafter attend the Washington school, and those living East of Arlington avenue up to and including Washington street, will hereafter attend the Franklin school.

A communication was received from Miss Bulkley with reference to the transfer of a certain class in the High School building. It was referred to the acting principal.

The Board decided to suspend the study of drawing during the month of September, and the matter of engaging a musician for the high and grammar schools was referred to the Principal and the Committee on Teachers.

The Board then adjourned.

A Late Mail from Plainfield.

Beginning on Monday a mail will leave this city each night for New York at 9 o'clock. This additional mail will prove a great convenience to the public in general.

The Colored People Play Ball.

On the Bowling Club's grounds, this Thursday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock, the Washington Giants will play against the Plainfield Stars for the colored championship of the State. A close and entertaining contest is assured.

Robbery at Scotch Plains.

Wm. Cocke was arrested by Constable Hand of Scotch Plains Monday, on a charge of breaking and entering the store of Lyman Walpole at that place, Sunday night. Justice Nash, before whom the prisoner was arraigned, held him for the Grand Jury.

Mrs. Ellis at Warren Mission Chapel.

Perhaps the largest audience that has ever assembled in Warren Mission chapel was present Sunday night, to hear Mrs. J. T. Ellis talk to the young men. The meeting opened with a service of song, after which Mrs. Ellis took charge and spoke eloquently on the subject: "Are you saved?"

Y. M. C. A.

The Workers' Training Classes of the Young Men's Christian Association, which have been so successful in past years, are to be started again soon. It is expected that two classes will be formed, one for beginners and the other for advanced scholars. The course of study in both classes will be for the purpose of fitting the members for better Christian work.

The first part of the lesson hour will be devoted to Bible study; the second half to the study of individual cases of inquirers. The lessons will be entirely different from the Sunday school lessons, but will be very useful to Sunday School teachers. The classes will be open to men only, but in order to accommodate the ladies their class will be continued. Any one who desires to join the classes or who desires further information may call on the Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., at the rooms of the Association, Nos. 8 and 10 East Front street.

They Attack an Old Man Rob and Almost Drown Him.

Five brutes, called men, set upon an aged and infirm man named Daniel Baker, Wednesday week, and after almost drowning him with buckets of water, robbed him.

The victim lives in a house on Terrill road, North Plainfield, belonging to Mr. A. D. Shepherd. On above day when passing Illsley's Hotel on Front street at Scotch Plains, five men came out ostensibly to "have some fun with him." He was doused with water until almost exhausted and chilled to the bone. He then started, breathless, for Paff's Hotel, but his assailants followed him, threw away his basket, and picked his pockets of every cent he had in the World.

Mr. Baker is only able to walk with the help of a cane, and is over 70 years of age. He has made a complaint before a Justice, so there is a possibility of his assailants being punished. But—poor folks seldom get redress.

The Hay Fever Continues to Stir Up Bradley, and He Stirs Up the Commissioners.

Emperor Bradley, of Asbury Park, who has at last awakened to the honest conviction that it is better to have a few licensed and public bars than a hundred sneaking rum holes, has something also to say about other illicit sales in his borough.

Mr. Bradley is in the mountains seeking relief from hay fever, and writes as follows to his home organ: "Query: Is it right for our Commissioners to expect Daniel Brower, Reeves Brown, T. H. Beringer and others of our respectable cigar dealers to close on Sundays while fellows calling themselves pharmacists—some coming from the Lord knows where—keep open and sell rum, cigars and numerous other articles that have no possible connection with medicine? Our own citizens should demand some protection from the Commissioners in this matter, or is their oath of office fulfilled when they care for the streets and light and sprinkle the town's driveways?"

ROBBED HIS EMPLOYER.

Charles Myer, a smooth-faced German, aged about nineteen years, who hailed from Union Village, has been employed as a farm hand for the past three weeks by Mr. Joseph King of Millington, a few miles Northwest of this city. Sunday afternoon while Mr. King's family were away from home, Myer ransacked the house, stole $61 in cash, from a bureau drawer, Mrs. King's gold watch and chain and a quantity of wearing apparel belonging to his employer. The man then hitched up one of Mr. King's horses, leaving a young colt behind, and drove to Plainfield, arriving here in time to catch the 5:16 P. M. train for New York. The horse was tied to a post on North avenue? where it was found about seven o'clock by Constable James A. Havy of Millington, who tracked the thief to this city.

Mr. King arrived home about an hour after the man had departed, and he at once discovered the robbery. He immediately notified Constable Havy and the two started in pursuit of the fugitive. The man left a small trunk in the buggy, together with a lot of old clothing. Mr. King offers a reward of $100 for the arrest and conviction of the thief. The matter has been placed in the hands of Chief Carey.

An Unnatural Plainfield Mother Wants to Rid Herself of Her Child.

A New York paper writing of "baby farming" in general, and how children are bought and sold, goes on to say:

"If you doubt the extent of this traffic in children advertise in any newspaper of wide circulation that you would like to adopt a baby. In the course of a week you will receive so many answers that unless you are a person of leisure you will be obliged to employ the services of a secretary to attend to your correspondence.

"Such recently proved to be the actual experience of a married man of means, living on Staten Island. His family consists of a wife and two grown-up sons. About six months ago he lost his only daughter, a bright little girl some twelve years of age. His wife was so grieved at the child's death that the gentleman determined, if possible, to replace the little one.

"This he found a comparatively easy matter, and a new daughter, as nearly as possible resembling the lost one, was soon installed in his household. But for many days after he had adopted the child letters continued to pour in upon him till the gentleman began to think that parental affection was an exploded idea.

"Judging from their tone and the paper on which they were written, a few of these letters were from people of refinement and education. One, in particular, was inscribed in a feminine hand, the paper was bordered with a black edge and the writer was presumably a widow. She said that providing the gentleman could furnish her with first-class references, she would be willing to absolutely surrender to his care and keeping a winsome girl, three and a half years old, with dark eyes, a sweet voice and pleasant manners. This epistle was signed 'X. Y. Z.,' and dated at Plainfield, N. J."

The most substantial and liberal of the fire and life insurance companies of the World, are represented by Messrs J. C. Pope & Co., of 6 East Front street. This firm places more insurance each year than most of the other agencies of the city combined. The reason is they offer the greatest inducements with the greatest security, and the most generous terms with the most generous provisions.

The Resignation of President French Not Accepted.

There was a good attendance in Reform Hall, Thursday evening last. The meeting opened with the customary devotional services. Vice President Harper presided, and Mr. Vanderbeek's full choir, with the exception of Miss Alice Smith, unavoidably absent, were at their posts of duty. Mr. Wheeler kindly officiated in Miss Smith's place as organist.

It being the regular monthly meeting of the Club, Mr. E. N. Spencer was selected to act as Secretary pro tem. After the transaction of sundry routine business, the resignation of John H. French as President was taken up, and a motion made that it be not accepted. To that Mr. Lamphear moved as an amendment that it be again laid upon the table, and gave at length his reasons therefore. The amendment was lost, and the question then recurring upon the original motion to not accept, it was, after free discussion, so decided by a unanimous rising vote in the affirmative, no one rising to vote nay.

Remarks were made by Messrs Angleman, Vanderbeek, Spencer, Lamphear, Beauvenache, Spicer, Goodwin, Boice and Harper, the prevailing sentiment being that Mr. French having promptly and honorably acknowledged his fault, and publicly reaffirmed fidelity to the pledge and the cause of temperance reform, he was fully eligible to continue the executive position he has so long and faithfully filled, and besides, it remained a cardinal principle of the Reform Club to lift up and cheerfully encourage, in lieu of casting down and forsaking.

The meeting with great pleasure heard Miss Ferris in recitation, and in the name of the Reform Club of Plainfield gave a hearty vote of thanks for the several acceptable favors rendered by her.

The Crescents Play Their Last Game With the West Ends.

The fourth game of the season's series between the Crescents, of this city, and the West Ends, of Somerville, is over. It was presented to his home club by the umpire, Dr. Matherson, because after Cary had been struck in the face owing to the darkness by one of Harkins' savage balls, and the umpire had refused to either give the little short stop his base or call the game, the Crescents refused to continue play.

The latter part of the game was even a worse exhibition of dirty ball playing than the West Ends are in the habit of presenting. Barring Bergen, Frelinghuysen, Bishop and possibly Williams, the members of the Somerville team are dead set against a square deal, and their management is even more nefarious. The Crescents will hereafter have nothing more to do in anyway with the Somerville team, and will never permit them to set foot upon the Plainfield grounds again.

The umpire of Saturday's game was an "honest man" utterly ignorant of the rules and no more able to tell a ball from a strike, than a babe. In the beginning the West Ends suffered some from his rulings, but he made up for such mistakes before the day was gone by robbing the Crescents of the victory they had earned. In the first inning he called McMurray out on two strikes, and Bowes out on a foul tip. He declared a hit ball "fair" that struck two foot outside the foul line and let in a Somerville run. He declared Bergen safe on second, when Bergen himself says that he caught the ball as he reached second and threw it out of Hammill's way. In running from first Harkins was plainly touched by Hammill, but again in his ignorance Dr. Matherson robbed the Crescents of the put-out.

But the umpire's most blooming efforts shone forth in the tenth inning. The Crescents were compelled to go to the bat in spite of the fact that it was too dark to see a ball low down on the diamond. Cary was struck in the forehead by Harkins, but upon the pitcher's claim that Cary stuck his head forward purposely, the umpire deliberately refused to give the batter the base he was entitled to. That was the last straw that broke the Crescents' back. The allowing of a claim that a player would court death by sticking his head in front of one of John Harkins' balls and in the dark, was too much and the Plainfielders refused to play any longer. Dr. Matherson then declared the game forfeited to the West Ends by a score of 9 to 0.

The language used by the West Ends in general during the game is mostly unfit for publication. Such terms as "dirty liar" applied by Mister Harkins to McMurray, were but mild Somervillian expressions. Then when the latter went to the bat in the seventh inning—after having already lined out a three bagger in the second—Harkins purposely fired a ball into McMurray's side and then turned his back on him.

The West Ends had announced that they would get the game no matter how many runs the Crescents made—and they did get it. When the Plainfield team stepped into the grounds the eyes of the Jews and Gentiles, who compose the West End club, shone with emerald envy. They saw that the Somerville team were nine foregone conclusions, and knew no way to overcome certain defeat but the way they took. They appointed an ignorant umpire and led him their way by the nose. But so far as Plainfield is concerned, that game was Somerville's obsequy. The Crescents henceforth play with gentlemen only.

The game was so far from being a game that a detailed account is not called for. The Curries did great work and their support was also great. Not one of the West Ends reached first base until the fourth inning. A mistake was made in substituting Gately in the eighth. But it was Walter Currie's own request. The mute, as usual of late, seemed sulky and unable to pitch a little bit.

The score was as follows:

Matters of Interest to All, from Fanwood.

The traveling show that appeared at Scotch Plains Friday, Aug. 30, and the incidents of its stop, afford the rustic moralist food for reflection. The belief is firmly held that in patronizing public entertainments of any kind people are moved less by the intrinsic merit of the promised performance than by their interest in the cause to financially benefited. They buy tickets, in other words, to one play or one ice cream festival in preference to another, not because they expect to receive more for their money, but because their interest is with the Baptist church or with the Methodist or Episcopal, as the case may be. So when one of the pillars of the Baptist church takes his wife and children to a raspberry festival given by the Methodists, this is looked upon by the latter as a veritable act of grace on the part of the aforesaid pillar, and as placing the entire Methodist communion under obligations to him.

Now, this being the case, and in view of the fact that with a really good play announced, and with most commendable objects in view, it has always been found a difficult task to fill Excelsior Hall—in view of all this, is it not rather remarkable that this traveling company coming along and pitching its tent in a vacant lot, should have drawn out a crowd of between two hundred and fifty and three hundred at thirty-five cents a head? But that was what it did; and the ticket seller, as he sat in his little box and saw the people come up in twos and threes and fours, and as he gravely raked in the shekels, must have thought that there was a good deal of money in Scotch Plains after all. As for the performance, it was what might have been expected. It would not have been tolerated in an actual theatre, but here in a tent, played on a little wooden stage built right on the ground and not making any great pretensions, everybody took it for what it was worth, and judged it accordingly. The supply of players was limited and the door keeper and one of the orchestra were pressed into service. Some of the players had to take two parts; the company only boasted of two scenes and these had to do double duty for Kentucky and Vermont. Sometimes the players would make their exit at one side, disappear around a wing and come out on the back of the stage just as the drop curtain was coming up, an interval of several hours and as many miles being supposed to have elapsed in the meanwhile. This is a species of entertainment that is fast dying out; you read about them but it is seldom that one actually sees them in this part of the country at least.

Mr. William Hazell and his friend Mr. Frank Roulstone went to Sewaren on Labor Day. In the same party were Miss Edith Randolph, Miss Bertha Corey, Miss Lida Mooney, Miss Mabel Mooney, Mrs. Mooney and Jim Gutinidge's Bro. They all had a jolly time and although they couldn't get hold of a boat until half-past five they didn't mind that a bit, but found the day all too short. Sewaren is a pleasant, quiet place, just fitted for a party of this kind.

Mr. A. D. Shepard and family, Mrs. Walter Mann and Miss Sarah Kyte, have returned from Avon Inn.

Mr. Charles Kyte has returned from a brief trip to Canada.

The Town Committee met at Excelsior Hall, Monday, Sept. 2. Henry Stites appeared before the committee and wanted to know why Westfield avenue hadn't been macadamized. "They put on the crushed stone," he said, "until they came to my house, and then they stopped just as short as if you'd cut off a cat's tail. Now I've paid taxes there for twenty-eight years and I think its time something was done." The committee assured him that the matter would be attended to. Testimony was also given showing that only a few days ago two cows and a turkey hen passed through the street leading from Mr. Stites' to the Methodist church. A demand was made that this road be macadamized.

The first car for Plainfield's street railroad passed through here a few days ago and excited considerable interest. Henry Cook remarked with truth that this was the first time that a street car had been seen in Westfield avenue.

John Cook made a donation to the District of ten tons of crushed stone, and paid for carting and laying it, too. The stone was placed on Westfield avenue.

Catarrh

IS a blood disease. Until the poison is expelled from the system, there can be no cure for this loathsome and dangerous malady. Therefore, the only effective treatment is a thorough course of Ayer's Sarsaparilla—the best of all blood purifiers. The sooner you begin the better; delay is dangerous.

"I was troubled with catarrh for over two years. I tried various remedies, and was treated by a number of physicians, but received no benefit until I began to take Ayer's Sarsaparilla. A few bottles of this medicine cured me of this troublesome complaint and completely restored my health."—Jesse M. Boggs, Holman's Mills, N. C.

"When Ayer's Sarsaparilla was recommended to me for catarrh, I was inclined to doubt its efficacy. Having tried so many remedies, with little benefit, I had no faith that anything would cure me. I became emaciated from loss of appetite and impaired digestion. I had nearly lost the sense of smell, and my system was badly deranged. I was about discouraged, when a friend urged me to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and referred me to persons whom it had cured of catarrh. After taking half a dozen bottles of this medicine, I am convinced that the only sure way of treating this obstinate disease is through the blood."—Charles H. Maloney, 113 River st., Lowell, Mass.

To the Friends of the Children's Home.

Back to our work once more after our Summer rest, we find ourselves facing our old perplexity—an almost empty treasury. At the close of our year in May, we had, it is true, a balance of $[illegible]. Of this amount we have used $[illegible] to pay for painting the outside of our building, and have paid the household bills, (which average from $100 to $[illegible] per month), for three months. At our meeting on Sept. 2, our treasurer reported less than one hundred dollars in hand—$80.[illegible]

There are eight forlorn little children waiting at our doors for admission to the Home. What shall we say to them for you? What shall we do for all the other poor little waifs, when the cold Winter comes on and claims their care? We are poor in purse, but rich in faith in the loving hearts and generous minds that have always responded so loyally to our needs. "Our need is our only claim."

For the Association,

R. E. K[illegible], President.

MANGLED BY THE CARS.

A horrible accident occurred at the Bayway crossing on the Pennsylvania Railroad, about a mile South of Elizabeth, little before 11 o'clock Friday, which resulted in the tragic death of Frederick Shultz, a baker of No. 831 Elizabeth avenue, and Ludwig Mussbauer, aged 18 years, his assistant.

The two men were seated in a bakery wagon and they started to cross the track in front of the approaching Philadelphia express train No. 18, going East, and due at Elizabeth at 10.49 o'clock, evidently not aware of the fact that the train was so near upon them. The pilot on the engine struck the wagon squarely on the side and hurled the occupants many feet in the air. The wagon was completely wrecked, but the horse escaped.

When picked up both men were dead. Mr. Shultz's head was literally battered to pieces, the brains oozing out and covering his shirt front. The unfortunate victims were taken to the Central Railroad station at Elizabeth, and County Physician Westcott was telegraphed for. Later Undertaker Jensen took charge of the remains.

Mr. Shultz was a hardworking and industrious man about 46 years of age. He went to Elizabeth from Baltimore and started in business with but $80. By honest toil and close attention to business he earned a living, and had secured a comfortable home for himself, his wife and eleven-year-old son. At one time during the late war Mr. Shultz was employed as a baker, and later he worked for Mr. Henry Voehl, a baker in Elizabeth, and a brother of Mr. Jacob Voehl of this city. He was a German by birth, an Odd Fellow and a member of the Knights of Pythias. The boy Mussbauer, hailed from New York, where he has a brother living. Mrs. Shultz is distracted through grief, and it required the combined efforts of two physicians to pacify her when the sad news was conveyed to her.

A strange incident in connection with Mr. Shultz's tragic death, is the fact that a cousin of the deceased was killed at Newark a few days ago, and Mr. Shultz was arranging to attend the funeral that afternoon.

ANNIVERSARY EXERCISES.

There was a large attendance at the anniversary exercises of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in the First Presbyterian church, last evening. Mrs. Dr. T. H. Tomlinson presided and beside her on the platform were Rev. Dr. Ketcham, Mrs. T. J. Ellis, Mrs. MacNaughton and Mrs. French. Dr. E. W. Hedges presided at the organ and Mr. S. I. Mitchell led the singing. The pulpit platform was dotted with bouquets of fragrant flowers.

The exercises opened with an organ voluntary, followed by singing. Rev. Dr. Ketcham then read the scripture according to the first chapter of the second epistle of Peter, and led in prayer. After a solo by Mr. Mitchell, the President then delivered her annual address, as published in full in THE PRESS.

Mrs. MacNaughton, the treasurer, reported these figures:

Total receipts for year	$1,105.00
Total expenditures	1,094.00
Balance	$ 11.00

Dr. Ketcham said that the president had stated in her address that it was generally acknowledged that women knew but little about finances, but he considered that they were good financiers. In the matter of temperance, said he, there are four things to be considered. The ladies have consecrated themselves to the work, they are advocating the cause, and they are also educating public sentiment in favor of prohibition. What remains is for the men to legislate in favor of it. The doctor closed his remarks by admonishing the men to stand up for the women in the matter of finances. The baskets were then passed by young ladies, and a substantial free will offering was made.

Mrs. J. T. Ellis was next introduced, and that lady delivered one of her polished addresses on behalf of prohibition and the suppression of the liquor traffic. The speaker said she came not to Plainfield as a stranger, moreover it seemed as though she was at home again. She also said that she rejoiced in the temperance work that was going on here, and declared that a check had been placed on the traffic. Mrs. Ellis made a touching allusion to her recent visit at Warren Mission chapel, and told of one instance where a young man of nineteen years had been raised from the depths of degradation, only to fall again on account of the numerous temptations around him. A second time the young man was lifted up, and again he was tempted by having a flask placed under his nose in the inquiry room.

Resuming her discourse Mrs. Ellis said: We are trying to save drunkards, but we go beyond that by going into the homes; we have paid rent, bought clothes and propped the men up, but they fall back. For sixteen years these noble women have carried on this work, and it is getting to be monotonous; we are now turning our attention to educational advantages.

The speaker also alluded to the cigarette nuisance, the social habit of treating and the habit of drinking at home.

Mr. Mitchell sang another solo, the congregation joined in singing a hymn, and Rev. Dr. Lewis dismissed the audience with the benediction.

Matrimonial.

(From the Somerville Messenger.)

Thursday evening George L. Henry and Miss Lucy J. Hendricks (colored), both of Plainfield, were united in matrimony at the house of the groom's brother, Daniel Henry, on Second street, Rev. B. F. Wheeler officiating. Only a few intimate friends were invited. After abundant refreshments were served the newly-wedded pair took the cars for Plainfield.

A Lawn Party at [illegible].

Miss Rachael Muir tendered the young ladies of her Sunday school class, a lawn party at her home on Linden avenue, Friday afternoon. All enjoyed themselves thoroughly.

Those present were: Miss Wally Taynor, Miss Jennie Taynor, Miss Sarah Taynor, Miss Susan Bowden, Miss Millie Linsly, Miss Ida Maris, Miss Ella Maris, Miss Annie Angerbauer.

Excitement on Broadway.

The police were summoned to a house on Broadway, late on Thursday evening, to eject a middle-aged man, who with his wife had engaged board there on that day. When the officers arrived at the house they found both the man and woman very much under the influence of liquor. The man who gave his name as J. B. Forth, and said that he travelled for a large New York house, was locked up. He said the whole trouble was caused by his wife, who is an habitual drinker. Yesterday morning the prisoner was released, and later in the day the couple boarded a train for New York.

Democratic Primaries.

The Third and Fourth Ward Democratic primaries were held Friday night and resulted as follows:

Third Ward—Chairman, Levi Kline; Secretary, M. R. Flynn; Delegate to Convention, Levi Kline; Alternate, Jas. Clarke; Member County Executive Committee, August Saltzman.

Fourth Ward—Chairman, V. L. Frasse; Secretary, W. H. Warner; Inspector of Election, M. Fields; Delegate to Convention, E. D. Moffett; Alternate, M. R. Flynn; Member County Executive Committee, V. L. Frasse.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Democrats of the City of Plainfield, in primaries assembled, do hereby pledge anew their fidelity to the principles of the Democratic party, and promise earnest and hearty endeavor to aid and advance the election of the candidates of that time-honored organization. We respectfully ask the toiling masses of our fellow citizens to compare the general business depression and universal reduction of wages with the specious and blatant promises made by the Republican leaders of the blessings to follow the success of the Republican candidates in the late contest.

Resolved, That we as one man proclaim that the contest shall be renewed on the line of battle fought in the last campaign, and that the slogan shall go forth, Tariff Reform.

Resolved, That we take no step backward, but still look upward and onward to assured success, knowing that we have been only defeated through unholy alliances and damnable schemes, whereby voters were marshaled in blocks of five as slaves under the lash of the master.

The Novel Fair at the Crescent, and Its Novel Features.

The Rainbow Bazaar at The Crescent closed last Saturday night. Of course there are no reliable figures yet as to the amount taken in.

The building was very handsomely decorated. As one entered he saw all through the room prettily arranged tables covered with the usual articles to be found at church fairs. Above all these were hangings and banner decorations, the whole making a pleasing and brilliant effect. Nearly all those who took part were from Scotch Plains, a few, however, coming from Elizabeth. The waitresses were arrayed in very pretty costumes; among those who acted in this capacity were Miss Maud Kyte, Miss Ella Frentz, Miss Edith Randolph, Miss Lillie Nicholl, Miss Blanche Sayre and a number of others. Miss Emily Moore and Miss Pease attended at the perfumery table. Here were some magnificent specimens of grapes raised in Mr. Moore's own grapery. Miss Smith, of Fanwood, had a table with a unique thing on it. This was called "Literary Salad," and was made of green and white tissue paper, arranged in such a way as to give it the appearance of an immense salad. The literary part consisted of slips of paper attached to the bottom of each leaf, and on these were written familiar quotations. Whoever drew out one of these leaves was required to give the source of the quotation found thereon. If successful he was entitled to a little badge consisting of a ribbon inscribed with the words "Literary Salad." There was great fun at this table. Judge Kyte drew "All men are created equal." "Procrastination is the thief of time" went unguessed by several who drew that and sent away.

Mrs. George Bates was in charge of a table devoted to pitchers, vases and ornaments.

Mrs. David A. Sayre and her sister-in-law, Miss Sayre of Brooklyn, had a table of brushes—brushes of all kinds, from a tooth brush to one for blacking boots.

Mrs. Edward Cutler, of Newton Centre, Mass., and Mrs. Deforest Thomas, had a very prettily arranged table covered with divers specimens of that all embracing genus called fancy things.

Two young ladies from Elizabeth had charge of the candy table, which seemed to be a centre of attraction during the evening.

Miss Carter sat enshrined in a bower, from whence she dispensed flowers in profusion.

Miss Pease was attired in a costume that attracted considerable attention. It was odd to a degree, being made to represent a bottle.

Miss Jackson of Brooklyn, and a friend, had a table for cloth, where you could obtain anything from an apron to a curtain.

Mrs. T. J. Nicholl and Mrs. Tappan Townsend were in charge of a very pretty table.

There was a gypsy tent, and very dark and mysterious it looked within. Deep, deep within its innermost recess, you might, if you had sufficient courage to penetrate the Egyptian darkness, have your fortune told. Mrs. McKewan guarded this awful place.

The soda fountain from Randolph's was kept busy all the evening.

Mrs. Samuel Ball furnished the waitresses with iced cream.

Mrs. A. P. Downer acted as cashier, and Mrs. Richardson assisted nearby.

A real, live phonograph was exhibited. This excited continued interest all the evening, and there was hardly a time when the five chairs around it were unoccupied. Five persons listened to the machine at once, sitting with the little tubes tight in their ears. A cornet solo was reproduced to the ears of more than a hundred delighted and astonished auditors.

The most successful table, financially speaking, may have been that of Mrs. George Moore, who had charge of the cakes. All the cakes had been given her so there was no expense.

If there was a prize for the prettiest table or the prettiest costume of the proprietors, it should go to the Japanese booth. Mrs. Cottrell, Mrs. Robert Thomas and Miss Ellen Cottrell were arrayed in Japanese costume, and the illusion being carried out even to artificial [illegible] on the eyes, the effect was startlingly realistic.

Among others who also assisted were Miss Tuna, Mr. Louis E. Tuna, Paul B. Tuna, Mrs. Clarence Smith, Mr. Pease and Mr. Harry Kyte.

A number of Scotch Plains people were on hand, among them being Mr. David E. Sayre, Mr. Walter S. Force, Walter S. Force, Jr., Miss Gertrude Rhinelander, Mrs. George Marsh, Mr. Clarence Smith and Paige Kyte.

Re-Opening the Schools.

The public schools, both in this city and North Plainfield, reopened for the Fall term on Monday. The attendance of visitors at the several schools was large. At the High School Vice Principal Goodrich presided and read an interesting letter from Miss Julia E. Bulkley, telling of her travels in Europe, and also admonishing the pupils to begin the school year with a determination to advance rapidly. Rev. Dr. A. H. Lewis and Judge L. E. Wadsworth each welcomed the scholars back to school. Many new faces were noticed among the pupils.

The morning session was devoted principally to classifying the scholars.

At the North Plainfield school over 500 pupils were present at the opening session, and Rev. T. L. Murphy made a few remarks to them.

BOROUGH COUNCIL MEETING.

The regular monthly meeting of the Borough Council was held Friday night, with Mayor Cooley in the chair. All the other members were present except Mr. Bettman. The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved, and Mrs. D. Jones was granted a scavenger's license. The Collector reported as follows on the taxes collected for 1888, since June 7, of the present year:

Borough	$12.51
Lights	36.14
Roads	25.02
Fire Department	6.95
Board of Health	2.78
Total	$83.40

A communication was received from property owners along the line of Willow avenue, agreeing to contribute $800 toward macadamizing said avenue, provided the work was done this Fall. Referred to the Street Committee.

Claims were presented, referred and ordered paid as follows: P. Kelleher, $3; H. H. Wilson, $5 and $3; S. Taynor, $2; J. M. VanFleet, $1.30; James Hardy, sundry claims amounting to $76.93; I. Brokaw, $11.40; T. McDonald, $37.50; N. Y. and N. J. Globe Gaslight Co., $269.30; W. M. Pangborn, $5; L. Courad, $7.05.

The report of Chief Martin of the Fire Department, called attention to the necessity of a new fire alarm system, and stated that the department apparatus was in good working order. The report was filed.

The License and Marshal Committee reported that certain repairs had been made to the borough lockup.

Mr. Smalley, from the Street Committee, reported that stone had been spread on Green Brook road for a distance of about 300 feet, and covered with gravel; the washouts at West End and Rock avenues have been filled in; the pay roll during the month amounted to $156.63, and about $100 more would be required to make necessary repairs.

Mr. McGee offered a resolution which prevailed, authorizing the mayor and clerk to borrow $1,000 for street lighting purposes.

Some discussion followed on the subject of cleaning out the gutters on Willow avenue, as well as to what disposition had been made of the dirt.

Mr. McGee said he would like to know whether or not the Street Committee and Council favored the Willow avenue petition.

Mr. Smalley asked to have the matter settled without his vote. A lengthy discussion followed in which all the members took part.

At the suggestion of the petitioners Mr. McGee offered a resolution authorizing the property owners along the line of said avenue to proceed with the work of macadamizing that thoroughfare sixteen feet in width and four inches deep, said work to be under the supervision of the Street Committee and Street Commissioner, and in consideration for the same, the Council will complete the work during the coming Spring. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

A resolution by Mr. Smalley authorizing the negotiation for a loan of $200 for street work was adopted.

Council then adjourned.

TWO TO ONE!

That's just what the average man finds that he requires, two pairs of pants to every suit. We know this to be so from the quantity of separate pants we sell. To meet this demand we always keep a stock of independent pants of every shade of color, of every variety of material and of every size. At the beginning of the season the stock is fullest, of course, and it is a good time in which to match up a portion of a suit. No matter whether you are long or short, thick or thin, nor what kind of a suit you want to match, you will find what you want right here. If you don't you certainly will not find it anywhere else.

Pants to work in; pants to wear to business; pants for Sunday or dress, and pants fit to be married in. What more need we say? Step in and match up the old suit and thus save the cost of a new one for a month or two. Poor advice for us to give, you think? That's so, perhaps, but we'll secure your gratitude and good-will now, and your money for a new suit will follow later.

THE THYRIDOPTERYX.

A Moth Which Is as Formidable as Its Name.

The Bag Worm and Its Destructive Work—How It Denudes Trees and Shrubbery of Their Foliage—An Enemy of New Jersey Origin.

The study of the destructive bag worm is [illegible], writes a New Jersey correspondent of the New York Sun. It is known to science as Thyridopteryx ephemeraeformis, a formidable name, certainly, but not more so than the pest. The parent insect is a very small moth, the wings of which are semi-transparent and small for the size of the body. The bags which they make may be seen hanging upon the twigs of trees all winter. The bags are nearly a [illegible] oval in shape, and they become gray with exposure to the weather. [illegible]

He ignores the dictum of Berry Wall, wherein the latter laid down the rule that young men of New York begin the day with an "absinthe frappe." At the St. Marc, where the new ruler resides when in the city, there is no quieter person in the hotel. It is situated on the topmost peak of Murray Hill and in the very center of wealth and fashion.

G. H. SANDISON.

HE HAS TWO HEARTS.

A Wonderful Colored Man Residing at Pittsburgh.

[illegible]

"I'se Daniel Williams King, the Yankee black man from Boston. I'se got two hearts an' two sets of ribs, [illegible]"

The foregoing was the startling announcement of a short, heavy-set negro who strode into the Pittsburgh Dispatch editorial rooms the other night. The colored gentleman took off his hat, mopped his brow with a bandana, and dropped into a chair. He then raised his only remaining upper garment and proceeded to roll about his abdomen, which consisted of a great soft bulk, in a most indecorous manner. Suddenly the writhings of the muscles ceased, and, when the city editor and the reporters put their hands on the negro, where formerly there had been only a soft bulk, there was now a hard, resistant, bony cage. In other words, the ribs appeared to extend from the neck to the legs.

With the hands of the spectators still on these false ribs the latter were gradually allowed to recede, and apparently telescoped up behind the true ribs.

At the request of Mr. King, the city editor put a hand on each of the negro's chest, and was surprised to find a distinct impulse or throb on each side, just below the nipple, as though two hearts were beating against the ribs. Next the negro, after a sort of convulsion of the abdominal muscles, protruded a violently throbbing internal object down below his ribs on his left side; then, allowing this to recede to its place, he pushed down what he called his other heart, which could be seen and felt pulsating low down on the right side. With one hand on this pulsating mass and the other on the left breast, both hearts could be felt distinctly beating.

Here it was thought advisable to call in a physician to explain the phenomenon. A messenger was sent out and soon returned with Dr. Chevalier Q. Jackson. The doctor proceeded to make a thorough examination, and soon reported the results substantially as follows:

"The man has two distinct hearts, connected only by the large blood vessels and probably a very elastic pericardium. He has the power of moving these two hearts independently, and can place them one at a time down in his groins, when they can be seen and felt pulsating. He can stop one or both from beating for a period of a minute and probably longer, if I would let him. The stopping of either heart stops the pulse-beat on the corresponding side. If both hearts are stopped no pulsation can be detected over the heart, at the wrist, temples, nor anywhere else in the body.

"The left heart is the larger, being as big as a cocoanut, which is a large heart for this sized man. The right heart is smaller—about as big as a goose-egg. When one heart is down in the flank and the other in its natural place the two organs are separated about fourteen inches. As they lie ordinarily in the chest they are about two or three inches apart.

"His pulsation is about normal; but he has a murmur in his right heart which may be from drinking. He has an alcoholic pulse, and probably if he doesn't give up whisky he will turn up some fine morning on the dissecting table. He will be worth more dead than living—that is, worth more financially—for any anatomist will give $10,000 for his body. As to the phenomenon of stopping his heart, that is not an absolutely new thing. There have been three similar cases known to science; one, who, after stopping his heart for exhibition, failed to get it going again, and died in consequence. None of the three cases I refer to could stop their hearts for as great a length of time as this man. I have warned him to be careful, for he already has a murmur in his right heart, and with his alcoholic habit it will be no surprise to me to hear of him some day not being able to start his heart after stopping it.

"The most peculiar thing about it is the fact that each heart appears to be complete and to furnish blood each to its own side of the body. In some species of the lower animals there are two distinct hearts, but in them the right side sends blood to the lungs and the left side to the general circulation through the whole body. As to his second set of ribs, they seem to be there, but the great thickness and rigidity of his muscles makes a positive examination impossible; certain it is, however, he has some sort of bony formation which he has the power to bring down so as to cover his bowels and entire belly, so as to make his trunk resemble a bony barrel. I will make a more thorough examination of him when I have more time. He is certainly the only man living who has any of the peculiar qualities that he has shown me."

Mr. King is about five feet two inches in height, of herculean build, with gigantic biceps. He has traveled from one end of the earth to the other exhibiting his peculiar attributes to the medical profession. He is at present boarding near the south end of the Pan-Handle tunnel. He says he is seventy-two years old, though he does not look it by thirty years. He claims to be able to bend a three-quarter inch iron bar across his left arm, and to feel his arm no one would doubt it. Physicians everywhere are intensely interested in his case.

BOLD BEAR STRANGLERS.

The Very Lively Time Two Cowboys Had with Two Grizzlies.

As Hank Cusker, the famous broncobreaker, and James McNancy, cowboys in the employ of the N-N outfit, were driving a bunch of horses from the head of the Big Dry to the round-up they encountered four grizzly bears, says the Glenway (M. T.) Independent. They determined to make it as interesting for the quartette as possible and instantly gave chase, armed with their lariats only. After chasing them a couple of miles and getting them separated they closed in on two of the ferocious beasts and proceeded to use their skill as rope-throwers in a very novel manner. They did their respective acts simultaneously and with precision, one catching his bear round the neck and the other surprising his by roping a hind leg. Then the fun commenced, one going in one direction and the other in the opposite, with the horses plunging and snorting and trying to get away, but they were hitched to too heavy loads and soon became tractable again. Cusker having caught his by the neck, soon had his bearship in a strangling condition, and with his usual courage proceeded to tie him as he would have done with a steer or bronco, and he eventually succeeded in his intended purpose. In the meantime McNancy was doing his best to interest his charge, and no doubt did so.

After making sure of his victim Cusker had a great curiosity to know how McNancy was getting along with his protege, and immediately started to hunt him up. He succeeded in finding him shortly, and his services were welcome, as the bear, being caught by the hind leg, had full control of his lung power and was making day hideous by his enraged cries. Cusker then undertook to do the tying act with this one, and becoming very bold after the experience with the other one proceeded at his victim without fear and got a couple of good rounders from the bear to pay him for his impatience. However, they were not very severe strokes, and after dodging around awhile they succeeded in getting a rope around his neck and then made short work of him. The only knife they had was a very small penknife, but they were bound to have the pelts, and after working hard for a couple of hours succeeded in securing their skins. When they had dispatched the two beasts they became quite bloodthirsty and wanted to do some more killing, but the other two bears had made a hasty retreat into the Bad Lands and could not be found, so they proceeded on to the ranch.

MR. DEPEW'S MAIL.

Singular Applications Addressed to the Famous Railroad President.

The correspondence addressed to most railroad magnates contains many singular and interesting things, but few, if any, men of note receive so remarkable appeals and requests as those which find their way into the mail of Chauncey M. Depew, writes a St. Louis Globe-Democrat correspondent.

About nine-tenths of the communications sent the president of the New York Central Railroad Company are marked with an unmistakable and conspicuous "Personal," the writers evidently believing that no graceless clerk would dare to invade the sanctity of their confidential outgivings. They seem to think that these gems of "true inwardness" are reserved to Mr. Depew's eyes only, when he sits in guarded closet with barred door to consider their desires. If these admirers of his would take the trouble to reflect a moment they would see that it is a physical impossibility for him to read one-tenth of these extremely "personal" appeals. Only the most important are brought to his attention, although he does see some of the funniest, [illegible] strong in Private Secretary Du Val, and when that discriminating inquisitor comes across a letter the flavor of which he knows would be appreciated by his chief he lays it aside for Mr. Depew's own inspection. Mr. Depew never discloses the name of a correspondent of this kind, but he often regales his friends with verbatim reports of what has been written to him.

Some of the people who address him give ample proof of a large endowment of "cheek." Not long ago Mr. Depew received a letter from a man living up the Hudson something less than one hundred miles above New York, saying that he had ordered a suit of clothes in town, but it was inconvenient for him to pay for them just now. Would Mr. Depew be kind enough to call at the tailor's, pay the bill and send the goods to the writer's address by express? He was wishing to come to New York and make a respectable appearance, and from what he knew of Mr. Depew's reputation as a kind-hearted and liberal-spirited citizen he was sure that he would not stand on so small a matter as a suit of clothes when a fellow being's happiness was at stake. However, he was not a man of extravagant tastes, he said, and the bill for the clothes was only fifty dollars; they would answer his purpose quite as well as more costly apparel. The postscript to the letter expressed the hope that a pass from [illegible] to New York and return would be sent with the clothes. By way of reciprocity the writer would do Mr. Depew the favor to call and see him when he came to New York.

"But this was not from an entire stranger, Mr. Depew?" was asked.

"Yes, it was. I never saw or heard of the man before, and he hasn't heard from me since." And Mr. Depew seemed to be enjoying the "gall" the fellow was having.

A WEALTHY RECLUSE.

Remarkable Story About a Rich Old Woman in New Jersey.

New Brunswick, N. J., has a genuine sensation to talk of. A genuine hermitess, it is alleged, has been discovered on the banks of the [illegible] Raritan, within a few miles of the city.

The heroine in this case is a woman whose age is placed at eighty. She lives, it is said, with a servant in an old mansion in the woods. She is represented to be very wealthy, and although most of the rooms in the house are never used they are handsomely furnished. The hermitess keeps to her room, and has not looked on a human face but that of the old servant's for thirty-six years.

Years ago, it was alleged, she was disappointed in love, and although a reigning belle and heiress she withdrew herself from all friends and society. Her meals were served to her on gold and silver dishes, and she still possesses the fine dresses and jewelry of her by-gone days. She has never slept in a bed since her disappointment in love. The old woman spends her time in reading the thousands of old, musty volumes in the book-cases in her room.

She is the last survivor of an old family, and refuses to hold intercourse with any one. She has twenty-eight cats, fifteen dogs and a goat, which she feeds on the choicest viands, and when any of her pets die she orders that they be buried in expensive coffins by an undertaker, and her wishes are faithfully carried out by the old servant. Her jewels are kept in a curious iron-bound box in her room.

Her estate is also large, and is looked after by a prominent lawyer, who transacts all her business with the servant only, who is as great a mystery as her mistress. The place is thought to be haunted by the ignorant, who shun it. There are people, however, who say they have seen the old servant digging in the woods at night by the light of a lantern. A large amount of money and valuables are said to be buried in the woods surrounding the old house. The name of the hermitess is Merritt.

Odds and Ends.

Better be alone than in bad company.

Forget other's faults by remembering your own.

Life is half spent before we know what it is.

It costs more to revenge injuries than to bear them.

The sickness of the body may prove the health of the soul.

One may discern an ass in a lion's skin without spectacles.

It is altogether in vain to learn wisdom and yet live foolishly.

The pen of the tongue should be dipped in the ink of the heart.

He who shows his passion tells his enemy where he may hit him.

The credit that is got by a lie only lasts until the truth comes out.

Before we passionately desire anything which another enjoys we should examine into the happiness of its possessor.

He who imagines he can do without the world, deceives himself much; but he who fancies the world cannot do without him, is under a still greater deception.

Patriarch of Shoe-Makers.

Abram Ephraim Elmer, who resides at Washington Mills, N. Y., is said to be one hundred and twenty five, and therefore the oldest shoe-maker in the world. His mother was English and his father a Mohawk Dutchman, and he was born January 26, 1764. At the age of twelve he learned his trade at Jordanville, and has continued at it ever since. He never used glasses, and his eyes only gave out recently, and it was only seven years ago he taught his son William shoe-making.

Where the Paper Goes.

What becomes of all the paper? There are 1,000 pulp and paper mills at work the year round. But the newspapers and magazines consume vast quantities of it. The Century Magazine Company take nearly 200 tons a month for their publications, and their paper bill amounts to $200,000 yearly. Harper & Bros. take 25,000 reams, Robert Bonner 10,000 reams at a time. Two cheap literature firms buy $300,000 worth of paper a year. One patent medicine firm buys $300,000 worth of paper every year.

RULES OF THE ROAD AT SEA

The Coming International Conference at Washington.

What it is Expected to Accomplish—The Present "Rules" Generally Regarded as Inadequate for the Increasing Ocean Trade—How to Avoid Collision.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

To the landsman the mere mention of the "Rules of the Road at Sea" conjures up a gloomy picture of stormy days, foggy nights and rockbound coasts. How vessels can follow a beaten track across seemingly pathless oceans; how they can communicate their wants and wishes to each other when many miles apart, and, above all, how they can avoid collision in the fog and darkness, is a mystery to him. As to the "Rules" themselves and the code of signals through which they are interpreted, he is usually profoundly ignorant.

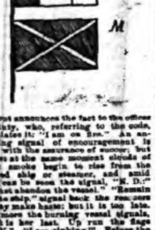
The International Code, which governs the vessels of all maritime nations on the ocean highways, is a ponderous affair. Originally it employed numerals, from 1 up to several thousand for the signals, and the number of words and phrases was limited to those likely to be used at sea. It was, in fact, a simple yet fairly comprehensive cipher, based on the same principle that is used by large mercantile firms in transacting business by cable. As steam was introduced and great freighters and passenger vessels began to multiply, the code was found to be inadequate to the needs of commerce, and it was reconstructed accordingly. In the place of numerals, the 18 consonants of the alphabet were used and with 18 code flags, and about 20 arbitrary signals it was found that no less than 78,000 distinct signals could be made by combinations. One, two, three or four flags are used in making the combinations, the latter being the maximum number under the code.

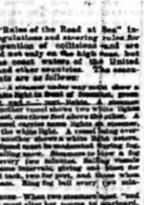
This system, which has been in use for many years, having been subjected to occasional revision, has again been found insufficient for the requirements of the vast traffic of the maritime world, and is now to be remodelled. On October 16, there will be held in the city of Washington, a conference of the Maritime nations, each country being represented by six practical seamen. This conference has been called for the stated purpose of revising "The Rules of the Road at Sea" and from the comprehensive nature of the task before it, it is probable that it will be a prolonged one. The United States will be ably represented, and France, Germany, Russia, Spain and Denmark will also be represented, while Italy, Austria and Portugal are expected to send delegates.

England's representatives in the conference will be Mr. Thomas Gray, of the British Marine Department, Chairman; Sir Digby Murray, Captain Wilson, Sir George Nares, Captain Hosier, the Secretary for Lloyds, and Admiral McClintock of the Trinity House. These gentlemen recently reported to the British Board of Trade that the entire signal system needed revision and suggested certain alterations. They declared that the two-flag system was faulty and should be rearranged and that there should be a special list of signals, to be made at night or during a fog by white or flash lights, and by day with flags or whistles.

There are three classes of signals in the International Code: Day signals, night signals and fog signals. Color, combination and position are all significant. Thus, when the lookout on the deck of a steamer or sailing vessel, or the vigilant watch at Fire Island, who first discerns in the offing the incoming vessel as she leaves the high seas and lays her course for New York harbor observes her signal hoisted, he can tell by the code her name, nationality and calling. If she has met with an accident her signals again tell the story, and assistance is speedily on the way.

There are some signals that have a sombre meaning to mariners, and their display by a vessel always sends a thrill of horror through the observer. Among the saddest are those that convey the intelligence of impending and seemingly unavoidable calamity. Up runs the two-flag signal "N. M." and the lookout announces the fact to the officer on duty, who, referring to the code, translates it: "I am on fire." An answering signal of encouragement is sent, with the assurance of succor; but almost at the same moment clouds of black smoke begin to rise from the doomed ship or steamer, and amid them can be seen the signal, "N. D.:" "I must abandon the vessel." "Remain on the ship," signal back the rescuers as they make haste; but it is too late. Once more the burning vessel signals, and it is her last. Up run the flags "W. V." "I am sinking!" Before the boats can reach her, all may be over, and another added to the long list of ocean tragedies.





The "Rules of the Road at Sea" include regulations and steering rules for the prevention of collisions and are observed not only on the high seas, but in all the coast waters of the United States and other countries. The essential points are as follows:

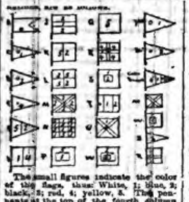
LIGHTS—A steamer under way must show a bright white light in front of foremast, green [illegible]board, and [illegible] port lights. A steamer towing another vessel shows two white lights on foremast, one three feet above the other. A sailing vessel carries same lights as steamer, omitting the white light. A vessel being overtaken by another shows a white light astern.

FOGS—Speed must be moderated during fog, mist or falling snow. Steamers to blow a fog whistle every two minutes. Sailing vessels blow at same intervals, giving one blast for starboard tack, two for port, and three when wind abeam. Ring fog bell every two minutes.

COLLISIONS—When two steamers meet, "end on," each must alter her course to starboard, thus passing on port side of one another. "End on" is where each vessel sees the mast of the other in a line with her own; or, at night, where the lights are seen in a line. Where two steamers cross each other the one on the starboard side must give way. A steamship must always give way for a sailing ship. In every case where under the rule one vessel gives way the other keeps on her course. In narrow channels every steamer must keep to starboard.

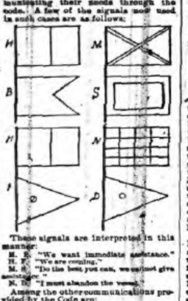
So numerous and disastrous have been the collisions at sea, in fog and fair weather, owing to misunderstandings about the "Rules of the Road," and so many questions have come up before marine tribunals for settlement involving similar disputes, that it is exceedingly probable that the "Rules" will be extensively amended by the Conference. In the marine disasters of recent years which have been attended by loss of life, fully twenty per cent. have been caused by this same misunderstanding, resulting in collision. The unavoidable conclusion in sea-going circles is that as captains are only too anxious to observe the rules, the fault rests with the code itself.

The International Code employs one, two and three-flag signals in all cases except for signalling the names of vessels, when four flags are invariably used. The regular signals of the Code, as now universally used by maritime nations, are as follows:



The small figures indicate the color of the flags, thus: White, 1; blue, 2; black, 3; red, 4; yellow, 5. The pennants at the top of the fourth column in the diagram, are simple affirmative and negative and the code pennant below is used to challenge attention to the fact that the code is about to be used. The four flags M, W, D and R, show the method of signalling the name of a vessel of war, or a merchantman.

There are many instances where vessels in distress find difficulty in communicating their needs through the code. A few of the signals now used in such cases are as follows:



These signals are interpreted in this manner:

M. B. "We want immediate assistance."
H. F. "We are coming."
M. S. "Do the best you can, we cannot give assistance."
N. D. "I must abandon the vessel."

Among the other communications provided by the Code are:

N. C. The International signal of distress.
H. N. "Engine or machinery disabled."
M. E. "Remain by the ship."
M. P. "Landing at this point is impossible."
M. Q. "Look out for a line."
M. V. "Lights will be kept at the best places for coming ashore."

These signals can be used either between vessels at sea or between vessels and a land station, with equal facility.

England's representatives will submit to the Conference nine new signals for adoption, and will ask that they be incorporated in the two-flag system. They are:

"I want assistance; please remain by me."
"You are standing into danger."
"Beware of derelict dangerous to navigation."
"Have encountered ice."
"The way is off my ship; you may feel your way past me."
"Stop, or heave to; I have something to communicate."
"Am disabled; communicate with me."
"Steer more to port."
"Steer more to starboard."

The two latter are for the use of vessels in signalling to tugboats in harbor.

The first code of marine signals, which was introduced in the English Navy in Queen Elizabeth's time, was a very primitive affair. "Good Queen Bess" found that her small but active men-o'-war were constantly fouling each other, and that the loss from this cause was about as serious as from wrecks by storms. So, in 1790, a regular day and night code was adopted. Many of the signals were arbitrary, but being recognized by the seamen, they were quickly understood. Here are two of them:

Loose maintop sail meant to "unmoor ship."

From these and some fifty others have sprung the three great systems of signals now in use—the day Code, with its square and triangular flags and pennants, the night, with its lights and rockets and the fog signals with their whistles, horns, bells and sirens.

In the American Navy and merchant marine, great interest is felt in the work of the approaching Conference. Leading shippers and importers all over the world, the managers of the great steamship lines who have many thousands of lives committed to their care every season, and the magnates of the coasting trade are all profoundly anxious that the code should be so revised as to limit the probabilities of collision in fog or darkness. Many of the veterans are also interested.

"When I commanded a vessel many years ago," said old Capt. Ambrose H. Snow, "there were no rules of the road. The captain did pretty much as providence directed him, and there were fewer accidents then than now, when captains sail according to written rules. It's true, there were fewer big steamers, though. The rules of the road are very useful when two ships are a great way apart, but when during a thick fog, a great iron hulk looms suddenly up before you, right under your bowsprit, you want to do something and mighty quick too. You try to remember the Rules of the Road, but you're in a muddle. Your experience tells you to do one thing, your rules tell you to do another. You make a third movement and, two days later, one or two of your survivors arrive in safety at the destination of the other ship."

It is not believed that the subject of fog signals will be taken up specially by the Conference, although in these days of rapid ocean travel and six-day trips to Europe, it may well be considered an important one. The fog signals now used are whistles, horns, sirens and bells. The number and duration of the sounds are significant. Here is an illustration, the dashes representing long or short whistles:

—— —— — — means "Attention!"
—— —— — "Full speed astern."
—— "I am going to starboard."
—— — "I am going to port."
—— —— "Yes."
—— —— —— "No."

The best of all fog signals is the siren, which can be heard a distance of twenty-five miles. It is, however, too ponderous an affair and requires too heavy machinery to be used on a vessel, so it is generally in a lighthouse or land station.

One very ingenious invention which will be laid before the Conference for consideration is a clock to be used in connection with fog signals. It works on the stop-watch principle, and is designed to measure the distances between vessels by recording the number of seconds that elapse between the fog signal blown by each vessel. Thus, suppose two steamers or sailing vessels are in a heavy fog off the Banks of Newfoundland, the captain of one vessel blows his fog whistle and simultaneously touches the clock button; when he hears the answering fog signal from the other vessel, he again touches the clock and it instantly stops ticking. The dial records the number of seconds that have elapsed between the signals. Sound travels at the rate of 1,100 feet a second and this number, multiplied by the number of seconds, gives the distance between the two vessels. If the gap is considerable, the signal is not blown for a full minute, when it starts again and the clock ticks simultaneously. At the response, it is stopped as before, and by the same calculation, the captain is enabled to tell whether the distance is decreasing or increasing, and will regulate his speed accordingly. If increasing, then he can proceed at full speed, but if decreasing, he will instantly signal the other vessel again and will change his course so as to give it a wide berth. Mr. N. H. Borgfeldt, of Brooklyn, is the inventor of the clock. It has been examined by a number of gentlemen interested in maritime affairs, including Captain Cowles of the United States Steamship Dispatch, Lieutenant Rige of the Hydrographic Office and Captain Ambrose H. Snow of Washington, but none of these gentlemen have tested its efficacy at sea. Sea-going experts believe that its success or failure as an experiment would depend a good deal on the promptness of the response and they are not prepared to say whether or not sound travels with the same velocity through a fog that it attains in the clearer atmosphere.

Another system of signals which may be discussed by the Conference is that invented by Mr. John Latham, and is designed to enable two ships to let each other know their position in a fog. The same inventor has an addition to the code for the use of the vessels in distress, by which they can let passing vessels know the nature of the trouble and whether they are in need of assistance.

"For some unexplained reason," said Mr. D. L. Bradley, editor of the "Marine News," the illustrated code signals, showing the flags which were issued from the Government printing office at Washington, have been allowed to go out of print and for a year and a half, captains of ocean steamers and sailing vessels have been unable to secure the flags in this country. They have been compelled to buy them in England. It is a strange oversight that such a thing should not have been remedied earlier; but I expect that after the Conference, the Government will print enough code flags to meet all demands."

DAVID WECHSLER.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

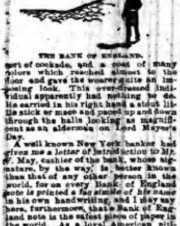
A Visit to "The Little Old Lady of Threadneedle Street."

No Longer a Show Place, and Admittance to Its Cellars Only Gained by Great Influence—Flunkies in Gorgeous Raiment—Its Night Protection.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

Westminster Abbey, the House of Commons and the Bank of England are the three great objects which the American sight-seer has first in view when he reaches London. England's Pantheon, and the great Parliamentary buildings have much that interests the sight-seer, but there is something about the Bank of England—perhaps its enormous wealth—that acts as a magnet to the tourist. A stranger in London will have no difficulty in finding it. Three score and over omnibus lines center at the famous monetary institution. From all parts of the city and its suburbs these omnibus lines run, and on every one of them is painted the words "Bank of England."

It is better known than the Mansion House, the residence of the Lord Mayor, and, indeed, the people reckon distances from the Bank of England. Seen for the first time through American eyes it is disappointing. It is an insulated assemblage of buildings and courts occupying nearly three acres of ground. It is dirty and grimy as all London buildings, but when examined closely the exterior shows wonderful taste and skill. The "Little Old Lady of Threadneedle street," as the Bank of England was called by its opponents in its early career, was designed by an architect who had an eye for the beautiful. It is built of brick and Portland stone, of incombustible material, one story and without external windows. The architecture is Corinthian from the Temple of the Sybil of Tivoli, of which one angle exhibits a fac simile portion. The chief cashier's offices represent a portion of the temple of the Sun and Moon at Rome. The entrance to the bullion yard is copied from Constantine's arch at Rome, and has allegories of the Thames and Ganges. There are magnificent halls, rotundas, public offices and committee rooms, an armory, engraving and printing offices, and an apartment for officers and servants of the bank. There is plenty of room even for the transaction of the enormous business of the bank. At each one of the entrances to the building is stationed a wonderfully costumed lackey. How many of these there are I don't know, but during a morning's stroll through the bank and its beautiful courts, I saw at least two score of them. They were all dressed alike, black trousers, light colored coats and vests, and wore black silk hats. Here and there as I passed through from one department of the bank to another I would suddenly stumble across a broad-shouldered Englishman, who wore a sort of cockade, and a coat of many colors which reached almost to the floor and gave the wearer quite an imposing look. This over-dressed individual apparently had nothing to do. He carried in his right hand a stout little stick or mace and paced up and down through the halls looking as magnificent as an alderman on Lord Mayor's Day.

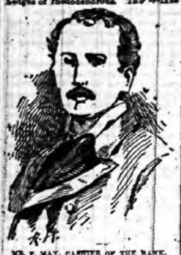


THE BANK OF ENGLAND.

A well known New York banker had given me a letter of introduction to Mr. F. May, cashier of the bank, whose signature, by the way, is better known than that of any other person in the world, for on every Bank of England note is printed a fac simile of his name in his own handwriting, and I may say here, furthermore, that a Bank of England note is the safest piece of paper in the world. As a loyal American citizen I am a believer in Uncle Sam's coinage, and it is all well enough for the United States, but there is no part of the civilized globe where a Bank of England note is not recognized, and they can be carried so conveniently that a great many travelers prefer these notes to letters of credit. Mr. May received me courteously. He is rather a good looking Englishman, with high forehead, clear eyes, short thin curly hair, a firm mouth and somewhat of the appearance of a student, although he was a famous oar in his day and a good all round cricketer. He explained to me that the bank was no longer a show place, that so many people, not only strangers, but Englishmen considered it their duty to visit the famed institution that it interfered with the routine of business, and now a pass to inspect the building is rarely given. However, I was one of the fortunate ones, and Mr. May detailed one of the magnificently dressed flunkies with the big cockade to take me over the building, show me its vaults and cellars, and, in a word, explain to me the workings of this great pivot of the world, for after all the Bank of England is the money center of the universe.

It was a few minutes before ten o'clock when we began our inspection and the first object of interest to which I was directed was the clock in the roof of the building. It is a marvel of mechanism and is connected with all the clocks in the bank offices. The hands of the several dials indicate precisely the same hour and second, and when it points to ten in the morning the bank is open for business, and in every monetary centre of the world is flashed the news that the directors of the Bank of England at their daily meeting have declared the rate of discount to be so and so—whatever those worthies may have decided upon—and which is the fixed standard of discount for all England, and influences the rest of the financial world.

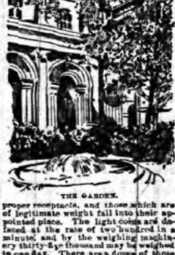
The interior of the bank has little of special interest. There is an air of respectability and solidity everywhere. There is no end of well dressed clerks counting money, paying it out, making entries in various big books, and explaining to this or that person the intricacies of the bank system. There is row after row of bank messengers, dressed in swallow-tail coats, waiting to make deposits or draw out money. There is a ceaseless jingle of gold, scurrying of messenger boys, and the din and rattle of omnibuses and cabs outside. There are any number of bank servants who seem to have nothing to do but stand erect and look magnificent. Their superiors who wear the cockades and flowing gowns of many colors, are so gorgeously dressed, and so haughty in manner, that they are allowed to twirl their maces and walk with measured step from one court yard to another. Through these court yards there are doors or gates from which the various divisions of the bank are reached. All of them are low, solidly constructed and modest, and grouped about in nine square yards. In one of these are three stalwart elms while beneath them is a fountain, a neat bit of soft well kept turf and clusters and hedges of rhododendrons. This strikes the transatlantic visitor as a little odd. He is hardly prepared to find a green court yard, robust trees, and the sentimental music of a fountain in the heart of the greatest bank in the universe, and it is safe to say that no other trees in the world grow in such expensive soil.



MR. F. MAY, CASHIER OF THE BANK.

The basement of the bank is very interesting. The visitor is taken through a carefully guarded iron door into a low roofed circular vault, near which are a number of small trucks loaded with gold ingots, collateral for the bank's notes. The ingots on each truck are built up in stacks to the amount of £80,000, or $400,000 of American money. These constitute the assets which the bank possesses against its liabilities on account of circulation and deposit, and the difference between the several amounts is called "The Rest" or balance in favor of the bank. For weighing, admirably constructed machines are used, and are accurate even to the weight of the most infinite small atom. Gold is almost exclusively obtained by the bank in bar form, although no form of deposit would be refused. It may interest the reader to know that a bar of gold is a small slab. It weighs 16 pounds and is worth £800, or $40,000. In the basement also is the barracks wherein a half hundred soldiers are quartered from 7 o'clock every evening until 7 o'clock the next morning for the protection of the bank. There is a library for the use of the men, who are also provided with a bountiful supper and breakfast, plenty of good tobacco and enough beer to satisfy even a thirsty Londoner. Every night in the year an officer at the head of this company of soldiers is marched over from the tower of London. At 7 o'clock he takes possession of the bank. This is a custom that dates back since the Lord George Gordon riots. All night long these men patrol through the halls, courts, and offices of the bank, and the outside is as carefully guarded. Indeed it may be truthfully said that from 7 o'clock in the evening until 7 o'clock in the morning "The Little Old Lady of Threadneedle street" is as well protected by Her Majesty's soldiers as Her Majesty in her palace at Buckingham. As there is plenty to eat and drink and a good wine cellar to choose from, it is not considered a bad post for even an officer, and it often happens that late passers-by can hear music and songs issuing from the building, for be it known also that the secretary, superintendent and various other officials with their respective families are compelled to live in the bank. They form a set of their own, and the young ladies give delightful little musicales, and teas, which somewhat surprise the unsentimental American sight-seer. Just imagine a musicale or afternoon tea in Wall or Broad street.

In the weighing offices is shown an ingenious machine, invented to detect "light" gold. About eighty or a hundred light and heavy sovereigns are placed indiscriminately in a round tube. As they descend on the machinery, those that are light receive a slight touch which moves them into their proper receptacle, and those which are of legitimate weight fall into their appointed place. The light coins are defaced at the rate of two hundred in a minute, and by the weighing machinery thirty-five thousand may be weighed in one day. There are a dozen of these machines, and one hundred thousand pieces have been weighed without an error. More than a quarter of the gold tendered in a year is light. The silver is put into bags each of £100 value, and the gold into bags of £1,000 value. These bagsfull of bullion are sent through a strictly guarded door or rather window into the Treasury, a dark gloomy apartment fitted up with iron bars, and made secure with solid locks and bolts.



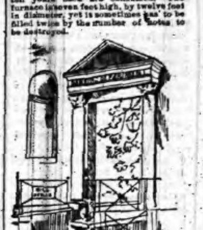
THE GARDEN.

The bank-note machinery exerts by the steam engine a power formerly employed by the mechanic in printing the note. The bank notes are numbered by a wonderfully accurate machine. As soon as a note is printed and the handle is reversed to take it out and put another in its place a steel spring attached to the handle letters and numbers that which is to follow. No note of a higher denomination than £1,000 is issued. The press is capable of producing these at the rate of three thousand an hour. There are other presses which print £5 and £10 notes. The number and date of each note are printed at both ends of it, and as the separate halves are thus easily identified it is no uncommon thing in England to cut a note in half and transmit each by separate mails or in different envelopes. The paper on which the notes are printed is made at a special manufactory. About 18,000 reams are supplied to the bank yearly and not the smallest scrap of it is wasted. If a note is spoiled in the printing it has to be accounted for just the same as a perfect one. The dies by which the water marks are made, and the plates used for printing are manufactured in the bank itself.

Mr. May told me that brittle as the paper seems to the touch it is almost as strong as parchment, and it is possible to hold a piece no larger than a note by the edges and place a fifty-pound weight upon it without tearing it. Its thinness and transparency prevent erasures, and other illegal alterations.

The Treasury, a sombre looking room surrounded by fire proof cupboards into which are stored eighty thousand sovereigns or an equivalent amount of notes, may be well said to be an interesting room. It is customary for the attendant to unlock one of these cupboards and take out a bundle of thousand-pound notes which he places in your hands. Each note is for £1,000 or $5,000. There are a thousand notes in each bundle, which weighs about five ounces, and is worth £1,000,000 or $5,000,000. They represent also tons of gold and never fail to cause expressions of awe and wonderment from the visitor.

The Bank of England is the banker of the Government, for here are received the taxes, the interest of the national debt paid, and the Exchequer business transacted. Considerably over a million is paid into the bank daily in the shape of notes. When cashed, a corner is torn off, and this now valueless piece of paper, after being duly entered in the books is deposited in chambers beneath the sorting room, and is kept there for ten years in case it may be required as testimony at some trial or to settle any other legal difficulties. In a furnace in one of the court yards once a month all the notes received a month previous ten years back are consumed. The furnace is seven feet high, by twelve feet in diameter, yet it sometimes has to be filled twice by the number of notes to be destroyed.



ENTRANCE TO THE BANK.

The bank possesses a very fine collection of ancient coins. Visitors are shown some bank notes for large amounts which have passed between the bank and the Government, including a single note for £1,000,000 kept in a frame. Among the curiosities are the bank note autographs. When any distinguished visitor arrives he is requested to place his autograph to an unsigned [illegible], which is immediately posted [illegible] one of the spaces. I was shown the autographs of Napoleon III, Henry V, Kings of Sweden, Portugal and Prussia, some members of the nobility and a few literary celebrities. The Committee of the Treasury meets weekly, and is composed of all the directors who have passed the chair.

Noland, chief cashier of the bank from 1788 to 1807, had slept in the bank building for twenty-five years. He had never absented himself a single night. There are in the bank over a thousand clerks at salaries ranging from £65 to £800 per annum. There are twenty-four directors, each having a nomination to admit one clerk, provided he be found qualified on examination. From twenty-five to fifty junior clerks are elected every six months. The sons of the clerks already in the service are sometimes given preferences. A scale of pensions for length of service and faithful work prevails.

An interesting chapter on the forgeries on the bank could be written. It would be a melancholy story. Through one person the bank lost £320,000 and through another £300,000. Of late years, however, there has not been much attempt at forgery. Everything is so carefully guarded, and all the employes are so well known and trusted that it would be impossible for the bank to lose anything by rascality or in any other way.

It would be impossible in the space of an ordinary newspaper article to give more than a brief outline of the bank and its workings. It has had its ups and downs. It has been now a suppliant then a dictator. Nurtured by Halifax, bullied by Walpole and coaxed by Pitt, it was thought to have been on the verge of bankruptcy more than once, and once it saved the country from bankruptcy. It is not generous to its enemies, and because it has not in all seasons of commercial distress been willing to play the part of benefactor it has been assailed by so many persons that the titles of their effusions cover thirty pages of the British Museum catalogue.

The most important function of the bank is the manipulating of the National debt by which it relieves the Government of all the details attending the transfer of stock and the payments of dividends. The National funded debt of the United Kingdom is now in the neighborhood of £700,000,000 and there are several hundred thousand persons who own Government securities.

So wonderfully accurate is the Little Old Lady of Threadneedle street and her thousand clerks that they have not been known to make a mistake these many years.

AFTER FORTY YEARS.

A Negro Mother's Long But Successful Search for Her Sons.

An interesting incident has just been brought to light in this city, writes an Owensboro (Ky.) correspondent of the St. Louis Globe Democrat. Martha Cabble served a great portion of her life in slavery in Virginia, and forty years ago was separated from her children, in order that her master might secure money with which he could enter an adventure for enriching himself. The mother and her offspring were owned by a planter near Richmond, Va., and at the breaking out of the gold excitement in California in 1849 her master sold her two sons, aged eight and ten years, to a slave trader from New Orleans to secure money to go to the gold fields. The boys were taken to New Orleans, where they were again sold, the oldest, Thurston Cabble, to parties in Henderson, Ky., and his brother Ned to a party living in Texas.

As soon as her boys were taken away from her, the mother, who was held by the chains of slavery, set about to learn where her children were taken to, and to keep track of them, hoping that some day they might be reunited. She succeeded in learning that they had been taken to New Orleans, but there she lost all trace of them, but did not despair, and continued her search by means of letters written for her by friends to various parts of the country, all of which were fruitless. As soon as she was given her freedom she worked hard and saved her earnings to enable her to pursue her search. She managed by stinting herself to visit New Orleans, thence she went to Memphis, Nashville, Tenn., and many other places, at last returning to Richmond, Va. During all her travels she would get friends to write for her to points where she would occasionally receive information, which might possibly bring her some news of her boy.

Finally she, by way of accident, learned that Thurston had been sold and taken to Henderson County. She got some of her friends to write to the members of the Baptist Church at Henderson. A reply was returned that he had gone to Daviess County, Ky. A letter was addressed to the Baptist Church in this city, which was handed to Thurston Cabbell, who has been employed for some time as porter in the Deposit bank in this city. Thurston at once secured money and forwarded it to his aged aged mother, who is now in the eighty-fifth year of her age and is nearly blind. The money brought the mother to this place this morning, and the meeting of the faithful parent and her son was a joyous scene. She was also rewarded by learning that her other son is doing well near Dallas, Tex.

AN OPERATOR'S RUSE.

How He Managed to Make the Enemy Take to His Heels.

Dr. J. Emmet O'Brien contributes a paper to the Century entitled "Telegraphing in Battle," from which this incident is quoted: "On one occasion an operator started out from Fairfax Station on a hand-car propelled by three contrabands to attempt to restore the line so that Pope's operators could communicate his whereabouts. Finding the line cut beyond Pohick bridge, he spliced it and got signals from both directions. While so engaged a party of guerrillas emerged from the woods to the track and surrounded him. Bidding the negroes stand fast, he dictated a swift message over the line, which was being repeated back to him and copied, as the Confederate leader leaned over his shoulder and read the significant words: 'Buford has sent back a regiment of cavalry to meet the one from here and guard the line. If you are molested we will hang every citizen on the route.' The instrument ceased ticking as the operator firmly replied: '.. —. —' (O. K.). A painful pause ensued. The Confederates might have suspected a ruse if at the moment a gleam of sabers had not shone in the direction of Fairfax Court-House. Hastily starting for the woods, the leader exclaimed: 'Come home, boys; these yere ain't our niggers;' and they disappeared, while the hand-car, as if driven by fiery contraband power, sped rapidly rearward. Pope's wires were not well guarded at any time."

DEMOCRATIC TICKET.

FOR GOVERNOR,

LEON ABBETT,

OF HUDSON.

RETROSPECTIVE.

We are nearing the close of the nineteenth century, and even a brief review of the material developments that have come into existence since its dawn is to reveal the marvelous, but at the same time to portray the truth.

Take for example the achievements of steam power alone.

Eighty-two years ago, August 11, 1807, a small craft, steam-propelled, slowly wended her way up the Hudson river. Crowds of people lined the river banks gazing in wonderment upon the novel spectacle, and not a few of them declared the experiment to be the foolish whim of some demented enthusiast, or, in modern parlance, a human "crank." That little boat was the Clermont, and her voyage the first practical attempt at steam navigation by Robert Fulton.

It is four score and two years since the wheels of the Clermont feebly agitated the waters of the Hudson, and what astounding results have followed that humble event!

The fleets of large and elegant steamers now swiftly and safely coursing the lakes, sounds and rivers of our country, and the gigantic floating palaces that make three thousand miles of ocean travel in a single week, is the emphatic answer.

The history of material progress is indeed marvelous, and it proclaims louder than words what mighty results can be secured from small beginnings, when fidelity of purpose is maintained in spite of every obstacle.

The retrospect thus partially unveiled shows the triumphs of scientific invention, but the query comes not amiss, have we kept pace in sound political development, which means the science of popular government?

When Fulton launched his experimental steamboat, Thomas Jefferson was President of the United States.

Have the principles of government, the plain, practical and honest methods of conducting public affairs, so nobly upheld by that distinguished statesman and leading artificer of the Republic, been preserved in undiminished integrity?

Truth responds in the negative.

They have not!

Because, otherwise, political virtue would be found ruling for the public honor and benefit, instead of corrupt politics to their disgrace and injury.

Will be Dedicated in October.

The McClellan monument, which is to be erected in Riverview cemetery, Trenton, is nearly completed and will be set up in October. Secretary Kelsey went to Boston last week to see it. It will be an imposing shaft made of Quincy granite, seventeen feet high, and weighing over 72 tons. The exact location for the monument has not yet been determined upon.

How the Rain Affects the Farmers.

The farmers are having rather hard luck this season. While their grain and grass crops have not fallen below the average, their fruit crops will in many instances be almost total losses. Melon vines have been destroyed either by wet weather or worms, and there will hardly be a half crop of muskmelons and watermelons. On a few farms the potato crops has been almost entirely [illegible], and in some cases the crop has been greatly injured by the fruit being beaten to the ground by the heavy rains and covered with dirt. The potato growers will be the heaviest losers. This is particularly noticeable in heavy soil, where the soil has become thoroughly soaked. Those farmers who planted their potatoes in light, sandy soil are more fortunate, and their losses will be comparatively small. Truckmen in this city say that potatoes will rise in price to $1 a bushel, during the Winter.

So-Called Prohibition in Plainfield.

We find the following editorial paragraphs in the Unionist-Gazette of Somerville:

> Plainfield is a prohibition town, yet [illegible] show that more beer is drunk under [illegible] than before. In August, 1887, it required [illegible] of beer per day to supply the [illegible]. It required over 12 barrels. In August [illegible] the [illegible] barrels a day, an increase of [illegible] per cent.
>
> The foregoing taken from the [illegible] Record is probably copied from some [illegible] newspaper in this State, which [illegible] printed the truth. We call upon the [illegible] Grand Plan of Plainfield to say [illegible] facts as set forth above [illegible] upon anything substantial. The statement concerning the [illegible] may be true; the statement [illegible] the present sales we believe to be totally [illegible].

The statement is probably "totally false"—as the Gazette asserts—and created entirely from the brain of [illegible] city. By this time our Somerville contemporary should know the ways and [illegible] so well that it need not make such a blunder as to appeal thereto for truth of any sort incompatible with the [illegible] or financial profit.

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION IS STRADDLED.

When the Essex county Republican delegates went into caucus at Trenton, Tuesday, they adopted as expressive of the sentiment of their constituents this resolution:

> Tests and trials wherever made have furnished incontrovertible proof that Prohibition, State or local, does not prohibit, and neither eliminates nor to any perceptible degree diminishes intemperance. The Republican party, desirous of checking the evil of intemperance as far as it is possible so to do by legislative enactments, is in favor of practical measures to that end. We therefore declare ourselves for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating beverages by a strict license system, under whose provisions all low dives can be suppressed and exterminated, while by the licensing of responsible citizens and places an adequate revenue may be secured to our cities and towns. Also for laws looking to the suppression of all adulterations of distilled and fermented liquors.

Then all hands assembled in convention and adopted this "straddle" of the question: "The Republican party of New Jersey stands committed by its platforms and legislative enactments to [illegible] thorough measures of temperance reform that will be sustained by the people." Which means, if it means anything, that the Republican party is for local option or high license if the people will keep them in power and keep them there.

In the words of the Trenton True American, "The great Republican [illegible] for local option in South Jersey, and [illegible] it in North Jersey, and instead of leading public opinion is prepared to be anything to everybody everywhere."

—Mr. W. S. Stevens of Dunellen is [illegible] for the statement that there is not a single vacant house in that borough.

CITY COUNCIL MEETING.

The City Council met in adjourned session at 8:30 o'clock Monday night with all the members present except Mr. Watson. The minutes of the previous meetings of August 5th and 26th, were read, thus closing the fifth volume of the minutes of the Plainfield Council. The minutes of the regular September meeting were also read and approved.

Manager Moore, of the Electric Light Company, communicated with the Council calling attention to the loss the company sustains by the malicious breaking of lamps and wires, and asking Council to protect the company's property. The matter was referred to the Police Committee.

Mr. Asa Collier asked for permission to erect a two story frame building with metal roof, 16x45 feet in dimensions, in the rear of the Olympia Bowling alley. Referred to the Building Committee.

Collector Johnson submitted his tax duplicate. It was referred to the Finance Committee and later in the evening it was approved and accepted.

Mr. Marsh, from the Street Committee, submitted a modified ordinance, designating a route for the Ball Electric Pump Company to string wires for the purpose of furnishing electrical power for pumping water. The ordinance was read for the first time, and when put on its second reading the first section was lost. Messrs. Dumont, Erickson, Jenkins and Marsh voting in support of it. The ordinance was then tabled.

Mr. Newhall, chairman of the Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery, made some preliminary remarks, before presenting the Committee's report on the matter of Water Works. He said among other things, that he did not want to accuse any member of the Council, but it seemed to him as though certain obstacles and influences had been undertaken to retard the Committee's progress in this important matter; one member of the Council, he said, had held an important document up to eight o'clock this evening. The Committee, he continued, have selected from among the bids, one which is in every particular, most favorable, so far as the Committee has any knowledge, and to let this opportunity go by, would be detrimental to the city's interests. The company referred to offered to supply a liberal number of fountains, and also to furnish water for churches and municipal purposes free, the rates to private consumers, Mr. Newhall said, are cheaper than those offered by any other company. He then presented the Committee's report, and accompanying resolutions as follows:

Your Committee have examined the several propositions for the construction of Water Works, referred to them on August 5, 1889, and now beg to report recommending that the proposition signed by Chas. K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell, dated Plainfield, N. J., August 5, 1889, be accepted subject to such modifications as may be required by the Common Council.

In the examination and comparison of the proposals your committee have been assisted by a comparative schedule prepared by Mr. Hering. This schedule we herewith submit for your examination.

The proposition of Messrs. Moore & Lovell contemplates the laying of over 2,000 tons of 12, 10, 8, 6 and 4 inch pipe. Your committee believe the total tonnage is amply sufficient, but recommend the use of 16, 14, 12, 8 and 6 inch pipe as one of the modifications to be required.

HENRY B. NEWHALL,
E. N. ERICKSON,
Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery.
Plainfield, N. J., Sept. 16, 1889.

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery be received.

Resolved, That the city clerk be directed to return all certified checks received with proposals for construction of Water Works on August 5, 1889, excepting the check for $2,000 which was received from Messrs Charles K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell.

Resolved, That the Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery be directed to prepare a contract in accordance with the proposition of Messrs Charles K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell, with such modifications in the interest of the city as may be deemed advisable, and to present the same for final consideration of the Common Council at the earliest practicable date, of which ten days notice shall be given, and copy of contract be placed on file with City Clerk ten days before the meeting.

Mr. Marsh said he was heartily in favor of Messrs Moore & Lovell's proposition, but he thought it best to know who was to employ the engineer; the matter, he considered, was an important one, and the people should have a voice in it. He made a motion to the effect that a further consideration of the matter be postponed until Sept. 30, and that the clerk notify the property owners by public notice that at that time they would be heard. No action was taken on the motion.

A long discussion followed, and finally the second resolution was adopted, authorizing the clerk to return all certified checks to the bidders except that of Messrs Moore & Lovell.

Mr. Marsh then moved to postpone further consideration of the first and third resolutions until the October meeting. The motion was lost.

Previous to voting on the above motion Mr. Squires took the chair, and President Dumont stated his views. He said he thought that the public sentiment was strongly in favor of the introduction of both water works and sewers. He thought the citizens should be given an opportunity to express their views as to whether or not the Council should go on and introduce water works independent of sewerage. Councilman Moffett concurred with the President.

After a lot of "rag chewing" the first and third resolutions were amended and adopted. [The resolutions as amended are published in full above.]

Mr. Erickson made a motion which prevailed, that 500 copies of the contract be printed for distribution. A resolution was also adopted by a vote of 6 to 4, authorizing the Water Committee to expend a sum not exceeding $200 for the employment of an engineer to assist in drawing up a contract.

The Salaries, Officers and Election Committee, recommended the following polling places, which were adopted:

First Ward—Peter Hoagland's express office on North avenue.

Second Ward—The Crescent building on Broadway.

Fourth Ward, First District—Alert Hose Company's House on Madison avenue.

Certain existing vacancies in the First, Second, Third and Second District of the Fourth Ward election boards were filled.

Mr. Marsh read a letter from Mr. Leo Daft stating that owing to a delay in forming a corporation he was not prepared to apply for a franchise to-night, but he hoped to be able to do so at the next meeting.

The collector was directed to prepare an index for his tax books, and the Finance Committee was authorized to procure a book for the delinquent tax collector.

Council adjourned at 11.55.

Began Work on Monday.

Michael Mahon, the contractor who is to construct the county road from Elizabeth to Springfield, began work on Monday, with a full force of men, and will proceed as rapidly with the work as circumstances will admit. He went over the route of the proposed improvement Friday morning with the view of locating unoccupied buildings for the company of the men who are to do the work. It is expected that a large force of men will be employed in the construction of the road, and property owners and others residing along the line will be pleased when the new road is completed.

PLAINFIELD WATER WORKS.

A SYSTEM FAVORABLY CONSIDERED AT LAST.

What is Proposed by the Fortunate Contractors, and What the People Will Pay for it All—The Rates for Hydrants, Faucets and Bath Tubs—The Public Buildings and Fountains That Will be Supplied Free.

At last the Council has taken a step towards granting a franchise for the construction and maintenance of a system of water supply for domestic purposes and fire protection in the city of Plainfield.

As THE PRESS readers expected—after the announcement exclusively made in these columns of Monday that perhaps the Council would grant a franchise that evening—the following action was taken at the meeting reported in full in Tuesday's issue:

"Your committee have examined the several propositions for the construction of Water Works, referred to them on August 5, 1889, and now beg to report recommending that the proposition signed by Chas. K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell, dated Plainfield, N. J., August 5, 1889, be accepted subject to such modifications as may be required by the Common Council.

In the examination and comparison of the proposals your committee have been assisted by a comparative schedule prepared by Mr. Hering. This schedule we herewith submit for your examination.

The proposition of Messrs. Moore & Lovell contemplates the laying of over 2,000 tons of 12, 10, 8, 6 and 4 inch pipe. Your committee believe the total tonnage is amply sufficient, but recommend the use of 16, 14, 12, 8 and 6 inch pipe as one of the modifications to be required.

HENRY B. NEWHALL,
E. N. ERICKSON,
Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery.
Plainfield, N. J., Sept. 16, 1889.

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery be received.

Resolved, That the city clerk be directed to return all certified checks received with proposals for construction of Water Works on August 5, 1889, excepting the check for $2,000 which was received from Messrs Charles K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell.

Resolved, That the Committee on Water, Printing and Stationery be directed to prepare a contract in accordance with the proposition of Messrs Charles K. Moore and Edward A. Lovell, with such modifications in the interest of the city as may be deemed advisable, and to present the same for final consideration of the Common Council at the earliest practicable date, of which ten days notice shall be given, and copy of contract be placed on file with City Clerk ten days before the meeting.

So far, so good. The nine proposals were dissected and tabulated in comparison columns, for the committee's convenience by Engineer Hering, showing at a glance what each offered and agreed in the way of hydrants, tonnage of pipe, rates, free service, etc. Then the most favorable proposal as a whole, was recommended as above. One thing in particular wherein the specifications of Messrs Moore & Lovell excelled the others, was the pipe tonnage. They designate the laying of 2,000 tons of pipe ranging from six to sixteen inches in diameter. This is more than any of the other bids proposed.

As to their standing, the fortunate contractors refer to John Taylor Johnston, John F. Plummer and others. As to the workmanship of their plant and system, they direct attention to the works they have erected at Greenport and Sag Harbor, N. Y. Mr. Moore is a resident of Fanwood, and Mr. Lovell is a resident of New York.

The committee are now to draw up a contract to submit for final consideration after ten days' notice to each member of the Council. As this will take time, even if the franchise is then granted, probably no work can be done before next Spring.

As the matter of water works in this city is now the all engrossing subject of conversation and curiosity, THE PRESS, as usual, is foremost in presenting for the interest of its readers a brief synopsis of what the contractors propose to do, how it is to be done, and what the people will pay for it, as follows:

The source will be from a subterranean water-bearing strata, by means of a sufficient number of wells to insure a steady and constant supply of 4,000,000 gallons of water per twenty-four hours.

Compound duplex steam pumping machinery will be erected with a capacity as above against a pressure equivalent to 200-foot head, or to throw five fire streams 100 feet high at one and the same time through 50 feet of 2½ inch rubber hose and one-inch nozzles, from any five hydrants on the line of the mains.

Wrought iron or steel water towers will be erected on high ground, of a capacity of not less than 500,000 gallons, and of sufficient height to give the city first class fire protection at all times.

A system of cast-iron water pipes will be laid, ranging from 16 to 6 inches in size in accordance with a map of Plainfield submitted to the Council. The pipe to be tested to a hydrostatic pressure of 300 pounds per square inch, and to be laid in trenches and covered with not less than 3½ feet of filling.

In laying the pipe "specials" will be provided at frequent distances so that hydrants may be connected with the system at the option of the Council.

It is also agreed to furnish and place in position a number of non-freezing fire hydrants—double delivery—2½ inch opening, threaded to fit Plainfield fire department hose. The number and location of said hydrants to be as shall be determined by the Council, and they shall be connected either during the progress of the work or afterward as the Council may decide.

The cost to the city for all water used from the hydrants for fire purposes, shall be an annual rental of $15 for each hydrant.

It is also agreed to furnish and erect five ornamental drinking fountains for man and beast—and to supply the same with water—to be located at such points as the Council may select, free of all cost to the city. Also to supply water for flushing the sewers of the city, and for the uses of the public schools, all municipal buildings, fire engine houses, Y. M. C. A., building, and churches, free of charge.

For the faithful performance of all these and any other contracts entered into with the city, the contractors will agree to execute a bond of $50,000 with such sureties as shall be approved.

The city shall have the right to purchase the works at the expiration of ten years from the date of completion, upon mutually equitable terms to be provided. Or they may be purchased immediately upon completion, at the actual cost with 15 per cent added.

Pure and wholesome water is to be provided to residents and other consumers at rates not exceeding the following per year, which are lower than offered by the other bidders:

The Somerset Street Bridge at Last Succumbs.

The rain storm which set in Tuesday afternoon, was one of the heaviest experienced in this locality this season. The rain came down in torrents completely submerging many of the streets, and under the railroad bridges the water backed up to a depth of several feet.

Park avenue from North avenue to Front street, resembled a miniature river, the water completely covering the road-bed and flowing along on the sidewalk. In many instances cellars were flooded.

Between five and seven o'clock the water in Green Brook rose over four feet, flooding the low lands between Somerset street and Tier's dam. Crowds of curious people gathered along the banks of the brook, and watched the water rise, and by eight o'clock the brook, which is usually less than a foot deep on an average, was a rushing torrent. Debris of every description floated down stream, but so far as reported no buildings were swept away, and no lives were lost.

Fully 200 persons gathered on Somerset street when the bridge at that point went out about nine o'clock, and for an hour or so the water flowed ankle deep over the roadbed on Somerset street.

Cedar Brook overflowed its banks inundating many of the cellars in the Eastern section of the city, but aside from this no great damage resulted. Stony Brook in the vicinity of the notch was swollen to alarming dimensions, but with the exception of a few washouts no damage was done.

At Bound Brook, the water in the Raritan river was very high. The tracks of the Lehigh Valley Railroad East of that place, were under two feet of water and it was with much difficulty that locomotives ploughed their way through.

Biographical Sketch of a Well-Known Westfielder.

(Extract from History of Tolland County, Conn., 1888.)

Chauncey B. Ripley, a practising lawyer in New York city, born in South Coventry, May 14, 1835, at the Ripley homestead, known as Ripley Hill, is the son of Chauncey Ripley, born at the same place, educated at Yale College, who was the son of Jeremiah Ripley, an officer in the army of General Washington during the Revolutionary War, and afterward county judge, from whom the homestead descended and takes its name. Chauncey B. Ripley prepared for college mainly at the Connecticut Literary Institution, Suffield, teaching in Windsor Locks and East Granby, Hartford county. He afterward taught at Scotch Plains and Westfield, Union county, New Jersey, was principal of the academy in Springfield, New Jersey, continuing his preparatory studies at Scotch Plains, under Rev. James Fuller Brown, D. D., a life-long friend, who subsequently became Chancellor of the University at Lewisburg. Entering the freshman class, University of Rochester, New York, in the Fall of 1860, he there took the first and second years of his college course. During junior year he had the chair of mathematics in the Flushing Institute, Flushing, Long Island, pursuing, meantime, the junior studies of his class, and entered the senior class of the University at Lewisburg in the Fall of 1863, where he was graduated in 1864, "an honor man," receiving then the degree of A. B., delivering the Master's Oration at his alma mater three years later, when he took the degree of A. M. After graduating from college he entered the law department of the University of the City of New York as a law student, and also the law office of Benj. Vaughn Abbott, Esq., then one of his professors in the law school, graduating in June, 1865, from that school, the valedictorian of his class, with the degree of LL. B. He remained in the office of his late preceptor, Professor Abbott, for a short time after graduating, and then opened a law office on his own account in the New York Times building, where he remained till the demolition of that building, in the Spring of 1888, when he removed to the Potter building, next door, where he is still in practice.

October 4, 1865, he married Cornelia Ross, daughter of Hon. Gideon Ross of Westfield, Union county, New Jersey. His wife, Cornelia, died March 14, 1883.

While attending to the duties of an active practice in his profession, Mr. Ripley has found time to develop and improve real estate in Westfield, New Jersey, where he resides, to the great satisfaction of himself and the admiration of many city friends who visit him at his country home. Mr. Ripley is one of the largest real estate owners in Westfield, and has opened and graded more than ten miles of public streets and avenues, planting the margins with shade trees, building houses and otherwise beautifying his grounds during the twenty years or more he has been engaged in the practice of law.

June 27, 1889, the faculty and board of trustees of Bucknell University (formerly known as the University at Lewisburg), Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, conferred upon its alumnus, Chauncey B. Ripley, the scholastic degree of LL. D., "for distinguished attainments in legal learning." Mr. Ripley has been twice elected president of the New York Alumni Club of Bucknell University, which office he now holds.

He was also elected and served several years as president of the Alumni Association of the Law Department of the University of the City of New York, and is now chairman of the executive committee of that association. For more than twenty years past Mr. Ripley has been annually appointed by the law faculty of that University on the committees for the examination of candidates for degrees in the Law Department and for the award of prizes for excellence in scholarship. He delivered the address on behalf of the Alumni of the University Law school at the inauguration of Doctor Howard Crosby as Chancellor, in 1870, and again on their behalf, in May, 1886, delivered the address on the occasion of the presentation to the council of the University of the memorial portrait of Professor John Norton Pomeroy, LL. D., formerly dean of its law faculty.

After the resignation of David J. Hill, LL. D., president of Bucknell University, he was selected to prepare a valedictory address to the out-going president, on behalf of the alumni of that institution. He was also named for the presidency of Bucknell University to succeed Doctor Hill and was urged by many friends and patrons of the University to become a candidate for that high office; such an undertaking, however, was so inconsistent with his chosen profession and other interests, that it could not be entertained by him. In addition to his practice in the State and Federal courts, the following is of record in the leading journal of the denomination referred to: "Chauncey B. Ripley has been long and favorably known in the higher judicatories of the Presbyterian church, for his marked ability as an ecclesiastical lawyer."

The members of the Firemen's Relief Association met Sept. 11, and elected the following delegates to the State Convention which meets at Long Branch on Sept. 25: T. O. Doane, E. C. Morse, H. M. Sherwin, Edward Mosher.

Somerset County Fair.

The coming fair is attracting attention and exhibitors are considering what they will send. It should be a fine exhibition and in many respects, doubtless, will surpass any past fairs. The premium list is an excellent one, and offers superior inducements to our stock raisers, horse breeders, farmers and others.

The Plainfield Bowling Club Condemns the Conduct of the West Ends.

At a meeting of the Plainfield Bowling Club held Sept. 11, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"In consideration of the thoroughly discourteous and unjust treatment received by the Crescent ball nine of this Club at the hands of the West End team, at Somerville, last Saturday afternoon, the Plainfield Bowling Club hereby resolves to have nothing to do in the future with the West End Club in any way, and that under no pretence will it be allowed to play again on the ball grounds in this city."

Interesting New Market Notes.

The public school opened its session on Monday of last week.

The Lehigh Valley R. R. Co., are putting up gates on the crossing of the main road between New Market and Dunellen.

The pear trees in the lawn of Mr. W. J. Davis, are now in bloom for a second time this year.

Some petty thieves broke into the cellar of Mr. G. W. Day's residence recently, stealing cake, wine and preserves. They will go it once too often, ere long.

Considerable indignation is felt at the loss of so many fish caused by the letting off the water of the lake. With previous experience it is to be regretted the State Commissioners do not place a wire screen at the gates. The last day or two bushels of fish have been picked up, some weighing as high as 13 lbs.

The sidewalks after a storm are in a disgraceful state, the centre being hollow. Pedestrians have to wade through water ankle deep from New Market to Dunellen. Not a dollar of the road money has been outlayed upon the foot paths, and the village taxpayers who contribute a full share of the cost of the roads have a right to complain. A fair share of the money should be expended for the benefit of those who cannot afford to ride.

The Dunellen end of the road is, if anything, in a worse condition, and the Borough Commissioners need waking up to the wants of the public in this respect.

A NORTH PLAINFIELDER COMMITS SUICIDE.

(From The Press of Sept. 13.)

Mr. George W. Townley, a well-known and universally esteemed resident of North Plainfield, committed suicide by shooting himself in the left side, in his barn on Grand View avenue, about nine o'clock this morning. He apparently enjoyed good health, and no direct cause is assigned for the rash act. He was about fifty years of age, and leaves a widow, three sons and one daughter. Mr. Townley had been depressed in spirits for several days past, so much so that his immediate friends noticed it.

This morning he arose as usual and attended to his accustomed duties about the house. As early as eight o'clock he went to the house of his son, Warren Townley, on Linden avenue, and borrowed the latter's double-barreled shot-gun, under the pretext that he wanted to shoot an annoying cat. Instead, however, he went direct to his barn, about fifty yards Northwest of his residence, and entering the building he deliberately shot himself in the left side, a few inches below the heart. Members of the family heard the fatal shot, and rushing out to the barn found the dead man lying on his back, with arms extended. An ugly wound with blood oozing from it told the fearful story. The gun, with one empty barrel, laid on the floor, directly under the corpse.

Borough Marshal McDonald was immediately notified and he in turn notified the authorities, but through some misunderstanding word was sent to County Physician Westcott, who has no jurisdiction in Somerset county, and later County Physician Wagoner of Somerville was telegraphed for.

County Physician Wagoner came down from Somerville this afternoon, and after viewing the remains gave the usual burial permit, deeming an inquest unnecessary.

Mr. Townley was a mason by trade, and for many years past, he has been one of Mr. Isaac W. Pangborn's trusted and competent employees. A few weeks ago, while work was slack, he took the contract for re-building the line bridge on Green Brook at Grant avenue, for $325. The bad weather during this week interferred with his work, and to friends he expressed his desire to complete the work within a certain time so as to fulfill his contract. This is said by some to have worked upon his mind, and is credited as the cause for his rash act. By others it is claimed that unhappy domestic relations led to the suicide.

Members of the family say that Mr. Townley was restless and uneasy during last night, and that he walked the floor continuously.

About five years ago Mr. Townley married Mrs. Aaron Lines, who originally came from Newark. No children came to bless the union, the surviving children having been born to his first wife.

During the war, in 1861, Mr. Townley enlisted in Co. I., N. J. Vols., from here, and served three years. He was a member of Plainfield Lodge, No. 44, I. O. O. F., and was considered an excellent working member.

There is still a mystery surrounding the tragic death of the late George W. Townley, who committed suicide by shooting himself in his barn on Grand View avenue, Thursday. Some people are inclined to believe that he was temporarily deranged, and in an unguarded moment took his own life; while others assign various causes. Nearly all agree, however, that Mr. Townley had become terribly agitated of late with reference to the completion of the bridge which he had contracted to build over Green brook at Grant avenue, and several persons claim to have heard him remark that he was afraid he would lose money on the contract. At all events the man certainly could not have been in his right mind to resort to such means for ending his existence.

The last sad rites following the tragic death of the late George W. Townley, who committed suicide on Thursday, took place from the deceased's late residence on Grand View avenue, North Plainfield, Sunday afternoon at two o'clock, Rev. C. B. Mitchell officiating. The house and yard adjoining were filled with sympathetic friends of the family. The pall-bearers were all members of Plainfield Lodge, No. 44, I. O. O. F., of which the deceased was a member.

At the grave the service was conducted by the Odd Fellows, who were present in a body.

A singular incident happened at the grave. The late rain has so thoroughly soaked the ground that the sides of the grave caved in, when the body was about to be lowered into it, and it became necessary to excavate a considerable quantity of earth before the closing scenes were enacted.

We Think So, But We Give it Up.

The following unintelligent item appeared in last week's issue of the Illustrated News, under the head of "Answers to Correspondents:"

D. Q., Plainfield, N. J.—He is a good ball player, being captain of a noted team. He never fought in the prize ring. He weighs in the neighborhood of 200 pounds.

Dr. Carroll Will take the Census.

Dr. H. K. Carroll, LL.D., editor of the N. Y. Independent, and a resident of North Plainfield, who has been secured to take charge of the religious census of the United States, has decided to establish his office in this city. Dr. Carroll has an important branch of the national census of 1890 to look after, and it will probably require nearly two years to complete the work.

Washingtonville News.

The recent heavy rains and high winds have caused heavy losses to peach growers throughout this part of the State, as most of the late kinds, such as Crawford's late and "Rare Ripe" were still on the trees before the storm. The ground is literally covered with the finest of fruit, which will be a total loss to the peach growers, as they cannot be placed on the market in their inferior condition.

Awarding the Bridge Contracts.

A joint committee from the Union and Somerset County Freeholders met at Illiley's Hotel at Scotch Plains, Friday afternoon, and awarded to the Dean & Westbrook Bridge Company of New York, for $1,375, the contract for the erection of an iron bridge over Green Brook on Union avenue, Scotch Plains. The new bridge will be 40 feet long and 20 feet wide. The contract for the stone work was awarded to William T. Johnson, of Scotch Plains, for $149.

The old bridge on Union avenue is to be transferred to a point beyond Seeley's mill, known as Somerset pond. Isaac Colthar of North Plainfield, received the contract to remove and rebuild the old bridge for $85, and George Walton is to put up the two abutment walls for $6 a cubic yard.

A Missing Rig Recovered.

John Shay of Elizabeth, was sentenced to State Prison in 1884 for burglary, and was afterwards declared insane and sent to the Morris Plains Asylum. He escaped yesterday and stole a horse and buggy belonging to James McCollum of Morristown.

Shay drove the stolen horse over the mountain and into North Plainfield, where he abandoned the rig after tying the horse to a post in the driveway leading to the rear of Mr. Samuel Hodson's residence on Somerset street. The animal was left standing there all day in the rain and last evening Constable Bauersachs was notified. He in turn communicated with Chief Carey, but the latter had already been notified of the robbery.

The two officers found the stolen property in Mr. Samuel Moore's barn on Manning avenue, where the horse had been taken for shelter. In the buggy there was a lady's sandal, No. 2. Chief Carey at once telegraphed to the owner of the rig, and he arrived in town Friday and identified the stolen property.

Lightning Takes the Plating off the Harness and Paralyzes the Horse.

The lightning struck and paralyzed a horse belonging to M. Higgins, proprietor of the Plainfield omnibus line, Tuesday afternoon, about five o'clock. The horse, attached to a rockaway, was in front of the Seminary on Seventh street when the flash came, and it seemed to Maurice Higgins who sat in the driver's seat, as if the lightning went directly down through the animal's neck.

The horse fell to the ground, breaking the shaft, and then plunged around wildly for a few minutes. Subsequently he seemed to all draw up in a knot, and his eyes stuck way out of his head. It was necessary to unhitch him and lead him home as he could not pull the carriage.

The silver plating on one side of the hames the horse wore around his neck, was all taken off, and the leather covering was somewhat blistered. The plating has also entirely disappeared from the metal tip of the shaft on the same side. The harness is now on exhibition in the window of THE PRESS office. The horse is much better today. Young Higgins the driver, felt a slight shock at the time.

THE FRAZEE LEE WILL CONTEST.

Another move was made in the above contest Tuesday, it being the granting of a rule for a struck jury by Justice Van Syckel. The motion was made by Messrs Jackson & Codington, the attorneys for the defendants, the Scotch Plains Baptist church, in the ejectment suit which will come on for trial in the October term of the Union county Circuit Court at Elizabeth.

The grounds of the application were the importance of the issues involved, the great value of the property in controversy and practically involved in the suit—over $100,000 worth of real estate—and the great amount of testimony which will likely be taken, requiring that men of known probity and intelligence should be selected for its trial. Argument on the question was had before Justice Van Syckel, at Toms River, Tuesday, where he was holding Circuit. Ex-Chancellor Runyon and John H. Jackson, of Jackson & Codington, appeared for the Church and the executors; and R. V. Lindabury, for the heirs, Ezra D., and Daniel Hetfield. The Court held it was a proper case for a struck or special jury, and so ordered.

The use of calomel for derangements of the liver has ruined many a fine constitution. Those who, for similar troubles, have tried Ayer's Pills testify to their efficacy in thoroughly remedying the malady, without injury to the system.

—Thomas S. [illegible], a jobs employee at the Pond Tool Works, was found sleeping in a baggage truck at the Grant avenue station, early Sunday morning, and he was arrested. Judge Stillman fined him two dollars.

—The [illegible] last Friday: "Don't fail to attend the Republican primaries to-night." The whole truth of the matter is that all of the four wards in the city held their primaries on Thursday evening, as told exclusively in THE PRESS of next day. Thus [illegible] so-called contemporary is a day late as usual.

—At the present time there are 872 prisoners in the State Prison at Trenton. The general health of the institution is reported good.

—A force of workmen are engaged in remodeling the interior of the First Baptist church. The old organ has been taken out and stored in Mr. Geo. A. Chapman's barn, at the corner of Central avenue and Eighth street, and will soon be replaced by a handsome new instrument from the factory of Midmer & Sons.

—Milton [illegible], a late promenader in North Plainfield, came up Somerset street on Saturday evening, and meeting Officer Giese at the corner of Front, he remarked; "Ah, there, officer, who the h— are you?" The officer placed him under arrest for disorderly conduct, and Monday Judge [illegible] fined him $5.

—It was stated at the Council meeting last Monday, that the reason Messrs. Moore and Lovell made such a liberal offer for the introduction of water works here, was because the firm thought that Plainfield would be a paying customer, and large revenue would be derived from private consumption, besides the revenue from the public hydrants.

—Saturday—one of the "Black Letter Days," according to Roman Catholic Use—one of the 67 "Minor Festivals" in the Prayer Book Calendar of our Holy Mother Church of England—commemorated the above Festival, which is annually celebrated in remembrance of the honor which has ever been paid to it by the Faithful since the discovery of the Holy Cross in the fourth century.

A [illegible] for Mr. Cleaver.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—Mr. Cleaver discoursed upon the "few that will be saved," to a few people at Reform Hall, Sunday, and his conclusion seemed to disparage the confidence in John's Revelation of the great multitude which no man could number. "They are before the throne of God and serve Him day and night." Will Mr. Cleaver tell us what he knows about the exception of these?

TRUTH.

—Use Dr. Dun's Remedy for the blood.

The word "musician," as used in last week's report of public school matters, had reference to a proposed accompanist, and not to a teacher of vocal music, as some have inferred. Mr. T. E. Hassell is, as heretofore, director of that branch in the Plainfield public schools.

Saturday's Ball Game.

The management of the Crescent Ball nine is negotiating for a game, next Saturday, with that celebrated professional team, the Acmes of New York.

Testimonial Concert and Hop at The Netherwood.

The event of the past week at the Hotel was a complimentary benefit given the musicians of the orchestra on Saturday evening last. The handsome sum of $100 was realized and paid over to the leader of the orchestra as subscribed by the guests of the Hotel. The usual Saturday evening hop closed a week of pleasant enjoyment.

The Hotel is well filled for the season, and a solid sense of comfort pervades the atmosphere. From present indications our worthy host will record an enjoyable Fall season, and we trust a profitable one. The Hon. Randolph B. Martine and family, of New York, are at present sojourning with us.

A Mean Joke.

One of the employees of the same office was made the victim of a practical joke on Tuesday. The young man was sent out on an errand, and as he was going some distance, he was told to take possession of a horse and buggy which stood in the rear of the office. The rig belonged to Mr. D. F. Randolph, and as the unsuspecting youth drove past Mr. Randolph's shoe store on West Front street, he was hailed by that gentleman and told to return the rig where he got it, which he did.

The young man then started out to complete his errand on foot, when he was arrested by Officer McCue. After a general explanation the matter was settled.

—The Guild of the Church of the Holy Cross, is preparing an entertainment to be given the latter part of this month for the benefit of the organ fund.

Beer Consumption.

Tuesday's news accuses the employees of the Pond Tool Works of drinking four barrels of beer a day, and thereby increasing the consumption of that beverage in this city, 25 per cent. in the last year.

M. E. Church Sociable.

The members and congregation of the M. E. church, tendered a reception in Vincent chapel, Friday evening, to their pastor, Rev. C. E. Mitchell, who returned home from Europe, that day. There was a very large representation of the members present, and all of them had a kind greeting for their pastor. During the evening there was vocal and instrumental music, and refreshments were also served.

Poor Somerville.

At the minstrel show, Monday night, Tambourine George Primrose and Interlocutor William West, had a "talk" in which the former proposed to give modern instances to fit any romantic titles the latter would name.

"Bound to Succeed;" quoted West.

"The Plainfield Ball Nine," answered Primrose.

"Dead to the World;" said the middle man.

"The West Ends," was the answer, and Music Hall shook with applause for some minutes.

Granted Alimony and Counsel Fees.

Mrs. Matilda G. Stryker, (nee Miss Tillie G. Tingley) of this city, about two years ago instituted proceedings against her husband, Wm. H. Stryker, now of Newark, for divorce, on the ground of infidelity. The case has been in the courts ever since, the last testimony having been taken in the Spring of the present year.

The testimony taken by Special Master in Chancery Blair of Jersey City, was submitted to the Chancellor, and on the 7th inst., Mrs. Stryker was granted a divorce and allowed $4 a week alimony and $50 counsel fees.

An Enterprising Firm.

Messrs R. W. Rice & Co., the enterprising grocers of North Plainfield, are the owners of a valuable tract of land situated near Wilkesbarre, Pa. The tract embraces about 450 acres, and contains in the neighborhood of 100,000 tons of coal. The firm is about to dispose of the land and invest the money in this city, where they now have about $42,000 invested in their business and in real estate, their latest purchase having been the Harriott estate on East Front street. The firm has recently completed extensive improvements to their store, corner of Duer and Emily streets, where they are building up an extensive grocery trade.

Ladies Training Class.

The Ladies' Workers Training Class for Bible study will resume its sessions on Friday, Sept. 27, at 4 o'clock in the Y. M. C. A. rooms on East Front street.

A short preliminary meeting for organization, etc., will be held on Friday Sept. 20, at 4:30 o'clock, to which all are invited.

It is hoped that many Christian ladies will avail themselves of this class during the coming season. The method and plans of study will be found very helpful to all who are engaged in Christian work of any kind. And while entirely distinct from the Sunday school lesson this study will be of advantage to the Sunday school teachers and advanced scholars.

An Exciting Runaway.

The handsome team of iron grey horses belonging to Mr. Lambert DeCamp, of "Dog Corners," ran away on North avenue, about half past 11 o'clock Saturday. The horses were attached to a heavy stone wagon. At the corner of Park and North avenues, the bit in the "off" horse's mouth broke, and the animals became unmanageable. The driver remained at his post, and made a heroic effort to guide the frightened horses along the crowded thoroughfare.

Dr. Geo. W. Endicott's carriage stood along the curb in front of Reynolds' pharmacy, and the runaway team collided with it, damaging one of the wheels. A farm wagon belonging to Mr. J. H. Mc Vey, which was standing in front of his restaurant, was struck by the stone wagon and badly damaged. At this point one of the horses fell, and the team was captured before doing further damage.

At Reform Hall.

There was a fair attendance in Reform Hall Sunday night. Vice President Harper occupied the chair, Mr. J. B. Cleaver conducted the devotional services, and the full choir of Mr. Vanderbeek's furnished, as usual, the finest of music.

The speaker of the evening was Mr. Cleaver, who in his usual forcible manner antagonized liquor selling and liquor drinking as the destroyers of both body and soul, and argued that if the liquor traffic was a good thing there was no need of regulating it, but if bad and destructive, the only proper course was to wipe it out of existence. He showed by pointed illustrations the absurdity of licensing evil for the sake of revenue, and concluded by declaring his own position to be—Firstly, a prohibitory law unto himself as an individual; secondly, to endeavor to influence others to do likewise; and thirdly, to educate public sentiment up to the enforcing standard of right duty. His remarks were received with great interest.

At Trinity Reformed Church.

Rev. U. D. Gulick, who was expected to preach in Trinity Reformed church Sunday, was unable to keep his engagement, and sent the Rev. Giles H. Mandeville, D. D., Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Education of the Reformed (Dutch) church of America. Mr. Mandeville proved to be a very able expounder of God's word. At the morning service he preached an eloquent sermon from the 12th chapter of St. John, 32d verse: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." At the evening service he again commanded the closest attention of his audience, as he discoursed on the continuing or unseen city, taking his text from the 14th verse of the 13th chapter of Hebrews. The learned divine gave such general satisfaction that many expressed the wish to hear him again, if opportunity offers.

Mr. Robert Gorton led the singing at both services, and at the morning service he sang "Calvary," by Rodney, as a solo, in a very acceptable manner.

ADDED AFFLICTION.

On Tuesday, Aug. 27, Hiram W. Templin, died of Bright's disease in the 57th year of his age at his home on the corner of Sixth and Sycamore streets. He was seriously ill for about four weeks, and left a wife, four sons and a daughter sadly bereaved by his death.

Mr. Templin was an exemplary Christian and a valued employee of the Scott Press Works. He was a quiet, unassuming man and highly esteemed by all who knew him, because of the upright life he lived during his residence of nearly two years among the citizens of Plainfield.

On Aug. 29, his remains were taken to Doylestown, Pa., his former home, for interment in the family plot. Monday the body of one of the sons who survived him was also taken to the same place and placed beside that of the father.

Elmer E. Templin, son of Hiram Templin, was taken sick with typhoid malaria just a week before his father's death. He died last Saturday aged 27 years. He leaves a wife but no children. He was an employee of the Pond Machine Tool Company.

Death of Mrs. Peter Hoagland.

At her home on West Front street, about half-past eight o'clock Thursday, occurred the death of the estimable wife of Mr. Peter Hoagland. Mrs. Hoagland was in the 58th year of her age, and has been a sufferer from Bright's disease for some time past. Her latest illness dated back for a period of only a few days.

The Royal Arcanum.

Under the new order of things existing in the Royal Arcanum New Jersey has been divided into eight districts, each presided over by a deputy. Once a year the grand regent, with his entire staff and whole council board of officers of all the councils in the district, makes an official visit to one council selected from each district.

The amount received by the grand regent and New Jersey councils for the Johnstown sufferers was by a singular coincidence exactly $1,105, the mystic number of the order. The total amount sent from New Jersey was $1,430.50. The order has paid the full amount of his certificate—$3,000—to the family of one member whose body has not been found, but who was undoubtedly lost in the Johnstown flood.

The Bowling Club Secures a Home for Its Members.

The Committee on sites for a permanent home for the Plainfield Bowling Club, reported favorably, Sept. 11, on the property at 11 East Second street, and they were empowered to make a lease for a term of years with the privilege of purchase, and to make contracts for fitting up the house with bowling alleys, billiard rooms, etc.

Action was also taken associating the Club in the Union County bowling league, and pledging the Plainfield team to take part in a schedule of games during the Winter for the championship of the county, with teams from Elizabeth, Roselle and Westfield.

The following were suggested by a vote of the members present, as a Board of Trustees for the incorporation of the Club: D. G. Adams, C. P. Leggett, C. C. Burnet, F. M. Slater, John Ulrich, G. W. Rockafellow and E. M. Stelle.

Why Old Men are Placed at Railroad Crossings.

"I notice," said a railroad officer, "that we are condemned by some people for placing old or injured men to watch crossings. Now, these men are placed at crossings because we have found by long experience that they fill the bill better than any other class of employees. An experienced man knows the responsibility of his position better than a young man who is liable to be thinking about something else, and the same is true of those who have been injured in accidents. They keep a much better look-out than any class we could employ. A young man who will accept such a job as watching a railroad crossing is too lazy to eat. Such a man is worse than nobody. A position of that kind has no future, and a young man who accepts it amounts to nothing. All the duties of the situation can be attended to by an old man or one partly disabled by accident, and nobody can fill the bill any better."

NETHERWOOD'S PLEASURES.

A grand progressive euchre party opened last week's festivities at this charming resort, Tuesday evening, and like its predecessors was pronounced a great success. The beautiful prizes were selected by Mrs. Benary, whose cultured taste in their choice received warm commendation not only from the fortunate winners, but the entire household. Your correspondent was one of the players that fate has decreed that no prizes shall ever fall into his net from this source.

Despite the fearful storm that prevailed the fore part of the week throughout the country, devastating other Summer resorts, the Hotel Netherwood stands on its beautiful height, untouched, proud and defiant.

The Hotel contains about the same number of guests as mentioned in my last letter. Everybody seems happy under the guidance and provision of our worthy proprietor, who is ably assisted by his Chief Lieutenant, Col. Frank H. Whiting.

ASLEEP ON THE TRACK.

Some time after midnight on Saturday, John McFadden, a married man aged about forty years, and Joseph McCabe, a companion about the same age, while under the influence of liquor, went to sleep on the railroad track, about fifty yards West of the Grant avenue station, and a half-hour later engine No. 117, attached to a pipe train going East, came along and struck McFadden. McCabe escaped injury.

The engineer on the owl train due here at 1 o'clock A. M., from New York, saw the men lying along the track and telegraphed back word from Dunellen. Officer Flannigan was notified, and he in turn secured a hack. A lantern and stretcher was procured from the railroad station, and Dr. J. T. Fritts, the railroad physician, was informed of the accident. A PRESS reporter accompanied the doctor and Officer Flannigan to the Grant avenue station, and after searching along the track for the injured man, it was ascertained that Mr. John Cooper, the night-watchman for Kline & Staats, had secured a stretcher from Muhlenberg Hospital, and with the assistance of the crew from a passing train, had carried John McFadden to the Hospital. When Dr. Fritts arrived there the patient was found to be suffering from shock. A hasty examination showed that McFadden's left foot was entirely severed at the ankle, the foot remaining in the shoe, and the flesh was stripped from the leg from the knee down, exposing the bone to view. The patient's left hand was also terribly bruised and discolored.

Dr. Endicott was summoned to the Hospital by telephone, and he and Dr. Fritts held a consultation. It was decided not to amputate the leg until a reaction set in. Accordingly at nine o'clock Sunday morning Dr. Endicott, assisted by the whole medical staff of the Hospital amputated the left leg above the knee.

Today the patient's condition is reported as slightly improved, but his recovery is decidedly uncertain.

Some two hours after the accident occurred Officer Flannigan found McCabe doubled up in a heap in the grass along side of the track. His hat was missing, and in appearance he resembled a dish rag. He was brought to town and locked up. Sunday morning he was fined two dollars and released.

—By-the-way, what has become of "Tom, the Peeper?"

—White hose were called in on the 16th instant, but they will be seen on the street for some time yet to come.

—Considerable damage was done by the storm in the neighborhood of Grove street and Green Brook road.

Robbers at Evona.

The residence of Mr. Henry Williams of Evona, was entered by some person or persons unknown, Sunday night, and robbed of a considerable quantity of eatables, etc. Entrance to the place was effected through the cellar; the entire contents of which, consisting of canned fruits, green vegetables, potatoes, etc., were stolen.

The Chimney Fell on Him.

John Cass, a young man, employed by Mr. D. W. Littell, the plumber, was climbing to the roof of Mr. Littell's residence on North avenue, when a brick chimney toppled and fell over on him. The brick struck the young man on the arms and shoulders inflicting painful bruises. He is able to be about, although feeling quite lame from the injuries he received.

State Weather Report.

The State Weather Bureau at New Brunswick has issued its report of the August weather, in which it says:

The coolest days were the 12th, 13th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 27th, 28th and 30th, the temperature ranging between 45.0 and 58.0 degrees.

The average precipitation for the State, 5.18 inches, is 0.44 inches above the normal and 0.95 inches below the average for the corresponding month of 1888. The Work of Mrs. Ellis.

(Contributed.)

The ladies of the Plainfield Woman's Christian Temperance Union, have been encouraged and enthused by the presence and earnest words of Mrs. J. T. Ellis. During the week that Mrs. Ellis was with us, she addressed three evening meetings, including and beginning with the anniversary exercises held in the First Presbyterian church, on Thursday, Sept. 5.

Three delightful parlor meetings were held in private houses—invitations having been sent to between five and six hundred ladies. Music and light refreshments added to the attractiveness and sociability of these gatherings, and all present were interested in and touched by the inspired words of the speaker.

Many were enlightened as to the magnitude and breadth of the work which this band of two hundred and fifty thousand white ribbon women is striving to do; many were impressed with the horrors of intemperance and the prevalence of the evil among women in high life, and all felt anew the responsibilities of motherhood.

Mrs. Ellis is not a stranger in our city, and the good work she has done here will not be forgotten.

Fall Overcoats.

No garment calls for as much skill in getting up as a Fall overcoat. The goods must be fashionable, the cutting stylish, the trimming handsome and the making the best, as the coat should be soft to carry over the arm, and still fit perfect, buttoned or unbuttoned.

Watson & Co. make a specialty of these garments, and show a stock large enough to suit all tastes and sizes, each style hung on separate racks to avoid all objectionable, ready-made wrinkles, and handy to view the different shades and patterns. Cremorne Meltons in all the new colors at $8—silver grays, dark grays, tans, drabs, browns and mixtures; in Kerseys, Venetians and Worsted, plain, plaid, striped or diagonal at $10, and all the novelties in high cost custom patterns at $12 and $15, silk and satin trimmed, are now ready for your inspection. Remember that Watson & Co. use no cutting machines, as they want more careful work, and their extension through to Nos. 166 and 168 Market street gives them room for enough skilled mechanics to cut every garment by shears, just the same as custom work. See the elegant garments in their windows and go through the racks of silk and satin trimmed garments on their second floor before you buy, or you may regret it when you see some friend have on one of the beautiful Fall Overcoats made by Watson & Co. and sold for $8, $10, $12 and $15 in confined styles not to be found outside of their concern, as you will see when you look in their windows.—Newark Press.

Facts Worth Knowing.

In all diseases of the nasal mucous membrane the remedy used must be non-irritating. The medical profession has been slow to learn this. Nothing satisfactory can be accomplished with douches, snuffs, powders or syringes because they are all irritating—do not thoroughly reach the affected surfaces, and should be abandoned as worse than failures. A multitude of persons who had for years borne all the worry and pain that catarrh can inflict testify to radical cures wrought by Ely's Cream Balm.

That's just what the average man finds that he requires, two pairs of pants to every suit. We know this to be so from the quantity of separate pants we sell. To meet this demand we always keep a stock of independent pants of every shade of color, of every variety of material and of every size. At the beginning of the season the stock is fullest, of course, and it is a good time in which to match up a portion of a suit. No matter whether you are long or short, thick or thin, nor what kind of a suit you want to match, you will find what you want right here. If you don't you certainly will not find it anywhere else.

Pants to work in: pants to wear to business; pants for Sunday or dress, and pants fit to be married in. What more need we say? Step in and match up the old suit and thus save the cost of a new one for a month or two. Poor advice for us to give, you think? That's so, perhaps, but we'll secure your gratitude and good-will now, and your money for a new suit will follow later.

For the fall, it has been decreed in the court of the great queen, wherever that may be, that the Directoire style is doomed. It will no doubt be used with some modifications, for it is, notwithstanding its elegance, too convenient and comfortable a dress to be wholly cast aside, even at the bidding of a queen. The Empire gown will remain in favor. Pointed waists much embroidered or braided, cuffs to the elbows, and very full sleeves are to appear. Some of the fall jackets in cloth are close fitting and much longer than usual. They will be becoming to some, but must be avoided by others for another style better adapted to their figure.

The new dress goods will show fine soft woolens in large plaids and stripes, and plain serges elaborately braided in shades of the same color or contrasted tones. The new colors are old copper, which has the glow of dying embers, old rose, soft greens and grays. A very rich effect is produced in those plaids by three or four shades of one color harmonizing with shades of another, as shaded gray with black, which will be very popular, or shaded olive green with old rose. The style of making must follow the prevailing mode of long lines, though it is said draperies will be shorter.

A Toiler Tells About the Life—Its Few Pleasures and Small Pay—The Money Lenders—A Clerk's Discouraging Prospects.

There are three classes of clerks who, according to a Washington correspondent, are alike contemptible. The gossips, the money lenders and the money borrowers. I mention the gossips first, because they are by all odds the most harmful. They are no respecter of persons, and can't be put down by anything short of dismissal. In some mysterious way they possess themselves of more or less information concerning each new appointee, in their own and neighboring divisions, and seem to find nothing so interesting as a little bit of scandal their ever-vigilant ears may catch.

[illegible]

The money-lenders are men, and occasionally women, who by thrift and economy manage always to have a sum of money on hand with which to favor needy fellow-clerks, at interest varying from five to ten per cent. a month. [illegible]

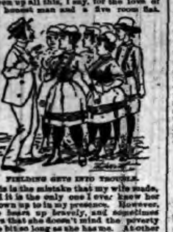
THE GIRLS PLAY BALL.

A Woeful Story of an Unfortunate Man Who Umpired for Them.

The National Game in Feminine Hands Is Much More Dangerous Than a Sewing Circle But Not Quite So Scientific.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

My wife has been down to the seashore for a month. I do not put this up as a bluff. She really has and no mistake. She hasn't been simply keeping out of sight like some other women I know who have given up indulgent parents with money sticking out of all their pockets, and homes where the luxuries of life were so crowded that they fell over each other—who have given up all this, I say, for the love of an honest man and a five room flat.



FIELDING GETS INTO TROUBLE.

This is the mistake that my wife made, and it is the only one I ever knew her to own up to in my presence. However, she bears up bravely, and sometimes says that she doesn't mind the poverty the bit so long as she has me. At other times she says that she could stand the poverty well enough if it wasn't for me, so on the whole we do not repine.

But, as I said before, my wife has been down to the seashore. She wrote me that she was enjoying the hops, sea bathing, and other proprieties very much but that the nicest thing of all was a baseball nine composed entirely of women. She said that there was another feminine nine at a neighboring resort, and that hers had challenged them for a game the following Saturday. They were to play for a banquet, and the defeated side was to pay for it. This was the reason why I accepted her invitation to come down and umpire the game. I thought I could save more money for our family in that capacity than my wife could playing away out in centre field.

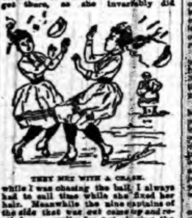
It was in this way that I came to secure the ill will of eighteen women to a degree that, I think, has never been equalled outside of Salt Lake City.

My wife's nine was called the Daisies and the others were the Lilies. The Daisies came onto the field with nine captains, so far as I could understand the situation. They all addressed the umpire at once, which was pleasant but not instructive. They had one substitute, and I was led to understand that she was a substitute for a captain.

I had met several of the Daisies before but the Lilies were all strangers to me. In view of this fact I requested Maude to refrain from ordering me around, because if the Lilies discovered that I was her husband they might object to my umpiring. Maude said that she did not think that they would suspect her of such a thing, but to guard against it she had arranged to flirt with a nice looking young fellow who sat on the grand stand. I suggested that to heighten the illusion perhaps I had better bestow some delicate attentions upon the pretty second baselady of the Lilies. Maude said that she didn't care, but she would simply call my attention to the fact that the large, fine looking gentleman who was gracefully leaning on a ball bat near the edge of the field was the husband of the second baselady, and had the reputation of seeing almost everything that went on in his wife's vicinity.

The game was more dangerous than a sewing circle, but not quite so scientific. When I called play the Lilies took the field. Their pitcher was a muscular young person with a determined eye. I had never before seen a woman who could throw a ball more than ten feet, but the pitcher of the Lilies was different. She was a widow, and the way she could throw things led me to wonder whether her late husband died of a teacup or a plate.

The catcher wore tan colored gloves and a light blue liver pad—at least that is what the professionals call them. When I saw what sort of ball the widow was throwing I implored the catcher to put on a mask. At first she said she would not wear the horrid, unbecoming thing, but when I called to her attention how much more unbecoming it would be to go through life with no nose she consented to get behind the cage. When two strikes were called she came up behind the bat just like Buck Ewing, but, of course, she did not catch the ball. When the widow shot it at her she said: "Oh!" and got out of the way. Then the ball went back to the catcher's fence and I had to chase it. This added considerably to my duties which rapidly became arduous. They were also dangerous, for whenever a young woman had three strikes called on her she screamed in a highly disquieting manner; shut her eyes; threw her bat wildly into space (and usually in my direction), and then made a frantic plunge in the direction of first base. When she got there, as she invariably did while I was chasing the ball, I always had to call time while she fixed her hair. Meanwhile the nine captains of the side that was out came up and reviled me cruelly for not chasing the ball faster.



THEY MET WITH A CRASH.

Some of them had only a misty idea of the rules of the game. Maude was one of these. On one occasion she reached first base while I was making my customary excursion after the missed third strike. It was her idea to get back to the home plate somehow and thus secure the applause of the grand stand which was liberal for the first two or three dozen runs that were made. Maude always was fond of admiration. When the girl Daisy who was at the bat after Maude had swiped the air three times she put her head down and set out for first base. This looked like an elegant chance for Maude, and so she came careering home over the first base line with her eyes shut. She and the other Daisy met midway with a crash that scattered hair pins all over the field. The widow, who understood the game to admiration, ran up and touched them both with the ball and I had to declare them out. The way Maude treated me after that episode very nearly led to the discovery of the relations between us. That, however, was reserved for the melancholy future.

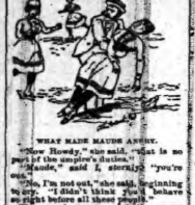
The first inning threatened to be eternal, for the catcher of the Lilies was entirely ornamental. She could not have stopped one of the widow's shoots if she'd stood in front of it, and she was too cautious to try that. In the course of time, however, one of the Daisies hit the ball, and this so delighted one of her admirers in the grand stand that he sent her a bouquet by a boy. With a desire to triumph over a rival she walked off her base and sweetly asked the widow to pin it on for her. The widow promptly touched her with the ball, and that settled it. The victim said that the widow was an ugly mean thing and she'd never speak to her again.

The Lilies weren't so lucky about it. The pitcher of the Daisies just tossed the ball in, and the first Lily to take the bat knocked the ball right down to first base. The first baselady fell down as [illegible] it was passing over the bag and secured an "out" which won her much applause. Then the catcher got hit with a third strike, and it made her so angry that she grabbed the ball and chased the batter all over the right field with it. Away out in centre field they both got tired and sat down; so I decided that the Lily was out for running out of the base line. She said that it was real mean anyway, and she continued to sit where she was and refused to be comforted.

Pretty soon the Lilies had to take the field, and the widow with the wicked eye was in the box again. I had a grudge against her for making me chase the ball so much, so I tried to coach the batters on the other side.

There was one pretty little Daisy in particular who came to the bat after my wife had reached second base. I was telling her lots of points about batting, and in order to make her listen I breathed a little delicate flattery into her shell-like ear. This tickled her so that she turned round to me and said, coquettishly: "Now do you really think I'm——"

She never got any further than that because, at that moment, the widow hit her in the back with a vicious in-shoot, and she fell into my arms in a dead faint. Maude had been fixing her hair out on second base, but at this unfortunate moment she looked up and saw me supporting the inanimate Lily. Maude always was of a jealous disposition, and this sight was too much for her. She just came straight for the home plate cutting off third worse than Mike Kelly did.



WHAT MADE MAUDE ANGRY.

"Now Howdy," she said, "that is no part of the umpire's duties."

"Maude," said I, sternly, "you're out."

"No, I'm not out," she said, beginning to cry. "I didn't think you'd behave so right before all these people."

The way she went on let the secret out, and all the Lilies began to accuse me of giving the game to my wife's side, and they said I didn't know any more about baseball than a cow. Then I got mad and called the game.

At this the reporters came upon the field, and got eighteen different versions of the score and of my infamous duplicity which they published in all the papers, under the heading of society news.

The female baseball season is now practically over, but alas we play the unfortunate game, which I have briefly sketched, around the domestic hearth every night. I shall never, never hear the last of it; and, by jingo! neither shall Maude. HOWARD FIELDING.

BESIEGED BY A COBRA

An Experience Which Came Near Turning a Young Man's Hair White—Saved at the Last Moment by a Courageous Fireman.

I was stationed at Sooraneagalum in 18[illegible], where I formed a close friendship with Tom Newdecate, the assistant traffic manager of the western section of the Chenapantam railway, says a writer in Chambers' Journal. He was a widower and I was a bachelor, and, being the only Europeans in the station, with the exception of Major Nimrod, the Government district engineer, whose duties seldom allowed him to be at home, we naturally spent a good many evenings at each other's bungalows.

It was a very hot June evening, and Tom and I were stretched in two American chairs in the veranda of my bungalow smoking our "trichees," when my "boy" came to ask for my instructions about a journey I had to make by train on the following day to a station a few miles down the line.

The prospect was not a pleasant one, as the land wind was still prevailing, and I felt little inclination to face that parching, fiery blast. Therefore, I did not look forward with eagerness to spending a day in the Dak bungalow at Sunbery Droog.

"Why not go to-night?" asked Tom. "I am running a special 'goods' to Pothanore at twelve o'clock, and you can be dropped at Sunbery. Or better still—I will go with you, and we will ride on the engine, the coolest place in the train by day or night."

I readily closed with the offer, the chance of traveling by night instead of by day at that time of the year being too good to be lost, and telling my boy to pack up a day's provisions, not forgetting a bottle of [illegible] and half a dozen sodas, and ordering the black chef to join him with his cooking utensils, Tom and I dozed off in our chairs to be wakened at half-past eleven o'clock. At that hour precisely we were aroused by the boy's monotonous "Sahib! Sahib!" and we were forthwith driven to the railway station.

We were soon off, and I found out at once that Tom was right about the engine being the coolest place. The velocity of the engine creates a current of air which rapidly absorbs the abundant moisture thrown out from one's pores when the thermometer registers ninety degrees at midnight.

With our cheroots burning fragrantly we bowled along very chattily, and felt regretful that we had not a longer run before us. Nothing worthy of notice had happened until the driver ordered his fireman to make up the furnace.

Sooraneagalum being upward of two hundred miles from the sea, coal or compressed patent fuel would be too costly to burn in the engines on account of the expense of bringing it from the coast; besides, coal perishes very rapidly under a tropical sun. Therefore, the furnaces are constructed to burn wood, of which there is a fair supply available from the company's jungle reserves. Of course, all fuel is precious, and drivers must take the fat with the lean—that is, roots as well as logs.

Now, snakes very much affect the hollow crevices of roots of old trees in India, and thus they are frequently carried into the wood-yards at the railway stations, and thence are occasionally transferred to the engine tenders.

This was exactly our case. As the fireman took up a log to throw it into the furnace, down dropped a lively cobra on to the foot-plate. It was not a very large specimen of "spectacles," about four feet long; but a one-foot hooder is quite enough to grant a passport to the stoutest man that ever hopped, and to frank him to that country from whose bourne no traveler returns. So, being four human beings on that foot-plate, and consequently somewhat crowded, we skipped back with much alacrity. Unfortunately none of us had a stick, or the matter could speedily have been ended. As it was, all we could hope for was that the reptile would glide off the engine, and drop on to the track.

But the creature showed no inclination to go. Either it knew the by-law against leaving the train while in motion, or it liked the fierce heat from the open furnace. It reared itself up, and in the hope of frightening it I made a kick at it, taking care, of course, not to let my foot go within striking distance, as my light shoes would have been no protection against those awful fangs.

It was an unfortunate demonstration; for the snake, so far from being intimidated, accepted the menace as a casus belli, and advanced upon us.

We were besieged.

The driver sprang out on one side of the engine, holding on the hand-rail which runs along the boiler; the fireman went up the pile of logs behind him like a mountain cat; "Tom" vanished from the scene on the opposite side of the engine to that the driver had taken, calling to me to follow him. They were all as much at home skipping around on the engine in the dark as squirrels on the top branches of a beech tree; but to me the unfamiliar situation was perfectly bewildering, and being partly fascinated by the loathsome thing, I was unable to stir, and my feet seemed rooted to the spot.

The cobra raised itself to strike!

I tried to jump off the engine, but I could not move. I would have called out, but horror had tied my tongue. The next instant I expected to receive the mortal wound, when the fireman slipped down from the logs behind the snake, seized it by the tail, and flung it bodily into the furnace. It was a relief to see that cobra squirming in the fire.

Sunbery Droog signals were now in sight, and "Tom" and I were soon after enjoying a peg in the station. But before the train went out there was a short interview between that fireman and myself; and by the very broad grin on his good-natured face, and the hearty "Salaam, Iyer!" with which he brought both his palms to his forehead, I judged he was well satisfied. Certainly I was.

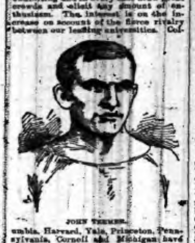
John Teemer Describes the Progress Made in the Art of Rowing.

The Evolution of the Oar—Radical Changes That Have Been Made in the Art of Training—How the Oarsman Earns a Living.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

Rowing has its ups and downs like every other athletic sport in society fashion. The men who know this best are the professional oarsmen who one season are heroes wherever they go and make money hand over fist and another are scarcely recognized outside of aquatic circles and earn only enough cash to keep body and soul together. At present it is in high feather. All over the country boat clubs and college navies are practicing, competing and exhibiting and in every case draw great crowds and elicit any amount of enthusiasm. The interest is on the increase on account of the fierce rivalry between our leading universities. Columbia, Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Pennsylvania, Cornell and Michigan have each one of them navies of which they can be proud and which in season and out do work of the best class. Even the smaller and poorer institutions of learning like Brown, Amherst, Williams, Dartmouth, Lehigh, Union and Toronto have excellent organizations, whose members, both as individuals and crews, will compare favorably with those of the larger and richer colleges. When it is remembered that these great schools have on their rolls over eight thousand names and close onto a hundred thousand alumni, it is easily seen how large an interest is centered in rowing events.



JOHN TEEMER.

Besides this, and to my mind, of greater importance, is the rapidly increasing number of boatclubs in every part of the Union. Go where you please and in every place you will find a club, and generally a good one. Even in such a small city as Montpelier, Vermont, there is a first-class organization which practices every day upon that badly-named but beautiful river, the Onion. So along the Long Island Sound and the Hudson River, there appears to be a club-house every ten miles, and the traveler along the Harlem River, and around the beautiful shores of Staten Island will be amazed at the number and at the excellent appointments of the club-houses that are to be seen there by the score. I have never heard how many there are, but judging from what I have seen and know I should say that there were at least four thousand boat-clubs in the United States with a membership of over half a million young men. These figures may seem large but when you think of such affairs as the New York Athletic Club, the Atalanta and Manhattan Athletic Club, the New Jersey, Williamsburg, Brooklyn and Staten Island organizations, each one of which musters a full regiment, the numbers seem understated rather than otherwise. Why, there are successful clubs on such little lakes as Greenwood and Ronkon Koma, and in such little towns as Bristol, Rhode Island and Sheepshead Bay in New York.

"Is there an improvement in rowing?"

"Of course there is and in every respect. Everything connected with aquatics has undergone the same change for the better as has everything in all the other fields of life. The oars or sculls, in the first place, are finer and more efficient to-day than ever before. The substitution of the spoon for the flat blade of the past was a vast improvement. Of almost equal importance have been the unnoticed alterations made in the shape and finish of the handle, in the lightening of the oar as a whole, in the curvature and outline of the blade and even in the selection and treatment of the wood from which it is made. The modern scull is lighter, stronger, handsomer and more effective than any past model known. There is the same development in boats. Whether made of cedar or paper, they are finer and lighter than ever before and their lines have less resistance and friction. Patent bracing, patent outriggers, patent sliding seats, patent foot-rests, patent metal cut-waters and patent diagonals, tell the story of how much thought and inventive genius have been devoted to the rower's art and of how much progress has been the result. One consequence has been the shortening of the time in every event. All records when examined turn out to be of recent date and coincide with the introduction and use of the inventions mentioned. Many of the great oarsmen of thirty years ago were better men than some of the champions of to-day and could have beaten them on even terms. But the improvements I have referred to have given the latter a great advantage and enabled them to eclipse the former in every feat from "singles" to "eights."

There has been a huge improvement in training methods, thanks to our doctors and experts. It is more like some Chinese school of medical treatment than anything else to read how oarsmen were put into condition in the old days. They took salts and senna, sulphur and magnesia, cathartic pills and blue mass until the wonder is that they did not die from excessive drugging. Then there was at that time a holy horror against fat, and the luckless oarsman had to wear "sweaters," which are the thickest jerseys that can be knitted out of woolen yarn, heavy overcoats, two and three suits of clothes, thick shoes and stockings and sometimes even comforters and tippets in order to produce copious perspiration and melt the fat through the pores. Beyond this there were all sorts of useless exercise. Dumb bells and Indian clubs, lifting heavy weights and shaking unwieldy bars were a small part of the training which a man in training had to undergo. Dieting was another feature. The candidate was not allowed to smoke or drink and was restricted to a bill of fare from which [illegible] pastry, confections and sweetmeats were rigorously excluded. The result of this treatment was disastrous in any number of cases. It weakened the man at his strongest points and threw needless strains upon other parts of his body. There is no doubt that the famous sculler Brown came to an untimely end from the unnecessary strain upon his heart produced by this method of training. It had one humorous phase, however, in producing boils all over the body of the rower and especially where he came in contact with the seat. On one occasion three of the famous Columbia College crew of 1878 were troubled in this way and for two weeks were unable to sit down and in fact to hardly move. The same trouble occurred to great crews of Harvard and Yale in this country, and to Oxford and Cambridge in England. This style, I am glad to say, is now out of vogue not only in aquatics but in every form of athletic exercise. People know more about the laws of health and strength and apply their knowledge in a very sensible and satisfactory manner.

The present style of training is simplicity itself. Its first principle is the avoidance of any shock to the body. The smoker is not compelled to give up tobacco and so suffer indescribable nervous pain, but merely to moderate and limit his use of the weed. The drinker is treated similarly and is allowed his bottle of Bass, his claret or Rhein wine with his meals. The regular course of nature is followed as far as possible. The athlete must go to bed and get up early. He must take long walks and runs, eat well and eat everything he desires that is not intrinsically unwholesome. He must bathe so as to keep the skin clean and allow the pores and glands to do their best work. In his exercise he must pay particular attention to the organs upon which his success depends. These are not so much the great muscles as is commonly believed, but the lungs and heart. When these are in bad form the oarsman, a minute after he has started, is in distress. The lungs are moving faster and the heart is overpowered with blood. The result is that the brain becomes surcharged and the man sees indistinctly, the breathing becomes hot, fast, irregular and then painful and, finally, the muscles refuse to do their proper work. To put these organs into good shape all that is necessary is to use those forms of exercise which call them most into use. Running, playing football, jumping the skipping rope, rowing, swimming, sparring, fencing and the like are invaluable in this respect. As to reducing weight, there is no need for heroic measures. The Schweninger system of drinking as little as possible and the Banting of confining one's self to a diet of lean meat and acid or sub-acid vegetables, exercise, warm bathing and regular hours are the chief means upon which the modern trainer relies. But above all he endeavors to avoid weakening the system by too much or too intense a training. It is far better for a man to be a trifle too "beefy" than to be overtrained. I may say in this connection that there is a curious fact which has long been known to all oarsmen but is almost unknown to the general public. This is that when a man's waist hollows in, his staying powers are nearly always poor, but when his waist curves out he is all right. Any training which changes a fellow's condition from the latter to the former is therefore very objectionable.

This is the reason why oarsmen are so much healthier than they used to be. They are also better appreciated in every respect. On the stage George Hosmer has been a drawing star for two seasons now, and promises to remain so as long as he stays upon the boards. Courtney and a dozen others, earn large money in coaching college crews and ambitious managers. Then here and there in summer-resorts by lake, river or arm of the sea are energetic hotel keepers, who employ professional oarsmen to give regattas and exhibition rowing or to take care of the boats and guests of the hotel. This latter practice is far more common in the West than in the East. The salaries paid in all cases are very handsome and the skuller is put on a par with the musicians, actors and other entertainers who, every summer visit our watering places.

HAND AT WORK.

There is no reason why he should not be. Rowing is a charming accomplishment on the one hand and a necessity on the other. Every child should be taught how to handle the oars and manage a boat. There is no knowing when that knowledge will be of the greatest value. Besides this, it is of the highest benefit to the health. Judge Joseph F. Barnard, of the New York Supreme Court has been upon that bench for more than twenty years, and has probably lost less time during that period from sickness than any other Justice in the State. The secret of his health lies in the fact that for at least thirty years he has used a "single" every day, when he has had the opportunity. His boat, as he makes it spin upon the Hudson, near his home at Poughkeepsie, is probably the most familiar object upon those waters.

Americans do not appreciate the high perfection to which oarsmanship has been brought in this country. No other nation can show such a roll as Hanlon, O'Connor, Lee, Ross, Courtney, Gaudaur, Hamm, Pilkington, Hosmer and Plaisted. They have gone to every land to meet rivals and have conquered fifty times where they have lost once. On the other hand, how many foreign oarsmen have ever come to the United States? Just as we have excelled in almost every other field to which we have given our attention so we have in aquatics. Our yachts are the swiftest and the safest, and our oarsman the finest and the best. JOHN TEEMER.

WONDERFUL CAJAH POND.

It Is Full of Floating Islands from Which Fishermen Troll for Pickerel.

A dispatch in a New York paper from a place in Minnesota, announcing as a remarkable fact the discovery of a floating island in a small lake in that State, inclines the residents of Honesdale, Pa., to the belief that if one floating island in a State so famous for natural curiosities as Minnesota is considered a wonder, they have been living all their lives with a still greater wonder close by without attaching any great importance to it. They have a lake a mile from Honesdale which is filled with floating islands. This lake is known locally as Cajah pond. It is two hundred feet above the village. It is dotted with a dozen or more islands. These are covered with trees, some of them twenty feet high, and a dense growth of thick-foliaged bushes.

The island bottoms are marshy, but the soil is stiff enough to sustain easily the weight of the fishermen who troll for pickerel from the islands in the summer fishing season. In the summer these little islands are pleasing variations in the beauty of the scene the lake presents to the spectator as he gazes upon it from the hills that encircle it. If the wind happens to be strong and variable, as it generally is on the lake, the visitor who looks upon the lake for the first time can hardly help being startled to see these islands moving about from one point of the compass to another as the wind shifts. On one day these islands may be seen huddled together in one spot, and on another day, perhaps, they will be seen scattered widely apart. An island from which the fisherman casts his line at one end of the lake to-day will, in all probability, invite him to it from the other extremity to-morrow.

The largest of these islands was some years ago partial to the lower end of the lake, and hugged the shore there with only slight changes in position day in and day out. During a stiff wind one day this island tacked first to one side and then to the other side of the lake, moving slowly the while to the upper end, until it was floated against the shore at that end. It remained there for two or three years through some of the hardest winds that blew off that shore. One day while three pickerel fishermen were fishing from the island's outer edge it suddenly was seized with a whim, induced or prompted only by a gentle wind, and before the fishermen knew it they found themselves fifty feet from shore. The island floated slowly across the lake until it had almost reached that shore, when a counter breeze struck it and sent it down the lake. It finally landed near the spot where it started from a year ago, and it has remained in that vicinity ever since, simply taking a short trip now and then to and fro across the lake, but always returning to or near its old moorings.

Although these fair islands are constantly shifting their places in the lake, they annually add perceptibly to their area. There are six or eight of them, and the scientific theory is that in time the roots of the trees that cover them will extend down into the water so far that they will anchor the islands in the lake, and that by the slow but certain processes of nature they will be increased in size until the surface of the lake will become solid land.

A BIT OF HISTORY.

Breckenridge's and Benjamin's Escape from the Country.

Recently I saw in a Southern paper a highly-colored and sensational account of the narrow escape and flight of General John C. Breckenridge and Hon. Judah P. Benjamin in their boaty trip through Florida in April, 1865, written a correspondent of the Philadelphia Times. Their fearful races and concealment to elude capture, apprehensive of recognition, dangers encountered, deprivations and perils experienced, were all glowingly portrayed. In the summer of 1875 I met General Breckenridge in Richmond, and one Sunday afternoon we were sitting alone in front of the Ballard Hotel. I said that, if not unpleasant, it would be gratifying to have him give an account of his escape and how it occurred that Mr. Benjamin was separated from him. He replied that he would cheerfully do so, and said that after following Mr. Davis some distance on the retreat he became satisfied that Mr. Davis had selected the most dangerous route, and to continue under his guidance, which he persisted in, capture would be certain and inevitable. "I decided to pursue a different course, and taking with me some trusty men and as few as possible, left Mr. Davis and his escort and struck off for the Florida coast. Soon afterward Mr. Davis, as I predicted, was captured. I met with some soldiers of the Federal army. They did not recognize me, and nothing specially occurred to cause me to apprehend my arrest or safety. I passed a squad of them in a gallop, but no demonstration was made against me, nor did they seem to be aware who I was." He said: "Having been accustomed in early life to hunt and travel in the night in Kentucky, I recalled the experience of my youth and adapted myself to change of circumstances, traveling incognito and with a few faithful and fearless fellows. In a short time, with nothing specially perilous during the journey, we reached the coast in safety. We then procured a small boat, and supply of provisions, which were easily obtained, as I was supplied with some gold, and with a small pocket compass which I always carried with me, and with J. Taylor Wood and two others in an open boat we started for the coast of Cuba. In two days and three nights of the most delightful and propitious weather we landed within one mile of the island, our only guide being my pocket compass. Captain Wood fell overboard during the voyage, but was soon hauled in, and was not the least disconcerted or alarmed. He was one of the bravest of men. After reaching Cuba I found friends and accommodations. I remained there a brief time, and then went to Paris and back eventually to Canada. The rest you are no doubt familiar with."

"Where is Mr. Benjamin?" I asked.

"He remained with me only a day after leaving Mr. Davis. He was a remarkable man; could adapt himself to any society or circumstances; could speak French, German and other languages fluently. He traveled through the country as a Jewish merchant, and sailed from Charleston, so I have learned."

I made a memorandum of this conversation at the time, and this is a verbatim report.

A SUBMARINE DUEL.

A Desperate Conflict Between Two Divers in the Ocean.

One of the best divers I ever met was old Captain Compton, who was murdered at the bottom of the sea, says a New York Herald writer. We were working at the time on the wreck of an East Indiaman, in the Atlantic side of Cape Cod, the peninsula side of Massachusetts. Among our crew was a huge Haytian negro known as "Nigger Jack," who had for some reason taken a violent dislike to Compton. He never lost an opportunity of picking a quarrel. Time and again they had tried to settle the matter with fists, the negro invariably getting the worst of the conflict. On the occasion I mention Compton, Jack and another diver were sent down together. After working a short time the negro suddenly drew his knife, and, springing at Compton, made a vicious lunge at his right side, hoping to cut through the canvass coat and dispose of him. The old captain was too quick for him, however. He caught the assassin's arm and threw him off, at the same time drawing his own weapon. Then began a battle for life beneath the waves. The captain glanced into the blazing eyes glaring at him from behind the negro's helmet, and knew that the life of one or the other would soon pay the penalty of the feud. Again and again the negro sprang at Compton, only to find his blows parried. Around they circled, jumping here and there, and we above grew alarmed at the strain on the air-pipes and life-lines, until suddenly a rush of water into Compton's pump told us that his pipe had parted. Quickly I sprang to the hoisting ropes intending to raise him before the air in the helmet should give out, but to my horror, they were slack, showing that they, too, had parted. At this instant came the "quick hoist" signal on the line of the other white diver and wild with fear we grasped the ropes and soon had him in the boat. Quickly we removed his helmet and plied him with questions. For a moment he could not speak; then he gasped: "Compton's dead; the nigger killed him; he cut the pipe and lines," and fainted. The shock of the submarine murder had been too great for even this strong man.

We tested the negro's lines; they were still taut, and arming ourselves with clubs we hoisted the murderer to the boat; he offered no opposition as we removed the suit and securely bound him. I instantly dressed and descended after Compton's body; the water around him was tinged with blood, and as I bent over him I noticed with horror that the front of his jacket had actually been cut to pieces, no less than a dozen wounds being afterward found upon his body. The negro was tried and convicted, but committed suicide by choking himself with the sleeve of his shirt.

AN ENGINEER'S STORY.

He Plugged His Engine to Avoid a Collision with a Lawn Party.

"One of the worst scares I ever had in my life was when I was running on the P. & R. road," said an engineer to a St. Joseph (Mo.) News reporter at the Union Depot, as a gang of enginemen were seated on the trucks, waiting for their turn to pull out. "It happened in this way: It was my second or third trip, I do not remember which, now, and I had the throttle wide open and working her in the last notch. I was pulling a mixed train, and among other things was a car-load of coal-oil in barrels. At that time we had no tank-cars, and the oil was not of as high test as at present. It was between nine and ten o'clock in the evening and as dark as a stack of black cats with their eyes punched out. It was a pleasant evening, just cool enough to be enjoyable. I was leaning out of my cab window smoking my pipe and keeping a bright lookout ahead. The old engine was pounding along smoothly, as though she enjoyed the run, and I fell to thinking of Molly and the little ones at home. Suddenly we swung around a curve on a side hill and a head-light flashed in my face. I did not wait for a second look. I pulled the whistle and the old machine fairly shrieked. I 'plugged' my engine, for we had no air-brakes then, and I went off, shouting to my fireman as I did so. I landed in a patch of blackberry bushes, and have a dim recollection of seeing the car loaded with oil whiz past me. I could hear the whir of the drivers in the back motion and the rattle of the brakes as the boys swung on them for dear life. I shut my eyes and listened for the crash, but it did not come. I looked up and the way car had stopped opposite me, while the passengers were poking their heads out of the windows of the coach behind it, asking: 'What's the matter?' I scrambled up the fill and ran to the head of the train, and there I found that the head-light I had seen was on a lawn where a summer-night festival was in progress. There were several head-lights there, but this was placed in such a manner that the light shone full on the track, and looked exactly like an approaching engine as we swung around the curve. It was many a long day before I heard the last of 'plugging' my engine to avoid a collision with a lawn party."

A Story of Justice Stephen.

An amusing story is told by the London Star of Mr. Justice Stephen's testiness on the bench. He was trying a poaching case, and to poachers he has always had a strong aversion. The barrister who defended the prisoner was frequently interrupted by the judge in the course of his speech. "Really, you ought to know that this is quite irrelevant," said the bench, and, at last: "You are confusing the case so much that the jury can't distinguish between the prisoner and the plaintiff." "Exactly, my lord," said the counsel, with great readiness. "You have put my case completely. The question of identity is most difficult, for the night was so dark that I don't wonder at the jury mistaking the plaintiff for my client." There was a verdict of acquittal, much to Mr. Justice Stephen's disgust.

Don't Be a Clam.

"How are you?" said the oyster to the clam. "So you are picked up and carried away to be eaten just like the rest of us." "Yes; it is sad. Oh, if I had only heeded the advice I received in my early youth." "What was that?" "Don't be a clam."

DEMOCRATIC TICKET.

FOR GOVERNOR,

LEON ABBETT,

OF HUDSON.

LEON ABBETT.

We advocate the election of Leon Abbett for Governor, not alone because he is the standard bearer of the Democratic party, as chosen by acclamation, but because of his eminent fitness for the office.

Leon Abbett is a Democrat without disguise. His partisan colors are openly displayed and devoid of fear or favor. He is undoubtedly a politician, but a manly one. He belongs not to that crowd of [illegible] and political plotters whose trade is trickery and corruption, and who, while professing all things to all men, prove faithful only to selfish personal interests. He differs from that disreputable class of politicians, for the reason, that he appears in the broad daylight of publicity exactly what he is, and honestly means what he says. Such a political character is worthy of respect and confidence.

It is within the bounds of truthful utterance to declare, that New Jersey does not possess a citizen more thoroughly acquainted with the affairs of State and the public needs than Leon Abbett. His past efforts on behalf of equitable taxation and the rights of labor are gratefully remembered by the people.

As Governor, Leon Abbett three years ago filled that honorable position with personal dignity, and the prompt and intelligent discharge of every official obligation, essential qualifications, and he will do likewise in the future.

POLITICS AND POLITICIANS.

We have nothing to say against politicians, be their partisan name what it may, when they seek to advance in an honest and honorable manner the true meaning and intent of American politics which is the science of government.

Free representative government is a practical science, worthy of the earnest study and support of every loyal citizen. It was never established for the purpose of promoting corrupt and mercenary aims of any kind, either individual or combined, but to protect and prosper, with equal and exact justice, the general public good, or in other words, a government for the benefit of all the people, irrespective of class, creed or condition.

Politicians may differ widely and honestly, as to governmental policy and candidates for office. That is natural and the rightful origin of political parties. No harm can possibly arise from such diversity of sentiment, provided, it is ever maintained with dignified propriety, and submitted without reserve to a popular verdict fairly obtained and expressed through the ballot box.

Is that commendable standard of political action upheld at the present day? Do not politicians now, as a general rule, serve party for personal pelf rather than for patriotism?

In propounding these questions, truth demands that partisan names be entirely ignored, because professional politicians of one party are as deep in the mud as those of the other are in the mire.

Instead of being an honest, intelligent and praiseworthy representative, advocate and sustainer of the sound principles of government, and a high grade of public virtue, politics has degenerated into an unprincipled strife for the spoils of office and places of power.

That is a deplorable fact, seen and admitted by impartial men of all parties, and that is why the expression is so often heard: "I am disgusted with politics and savory politicians!"

Happy would it be for the character and stability of the American Republic, and the best interests of the people, if the might of popular retribution could be invoked to thoroughly cleanse the Augean stable of modern politics.

Then would the thieving system of election bribery and corruption be checked, the base tactics of slander and falsehood suppressed, and then personal ability, integrity and morality would be the only accepted credentials to all official and legislative positions.

The Freshet.

The last freshet did more damage in this city than was first reported, especially so far as flooding the cellars are concerned. Few if any cellars in the vicinity of Broadway, Tenth street [illegible] Putnam avenue escaped being flooded, and in many instances the water flowed into the cellars to a depth of two feet. All day yesterday the work of pumping out the cellars went on. The basement in ex-Councilman Glenn's residence on Broadway, which stands on what is hitherto considered high land was flooded and the kitchen had to be abandoned. In scores of other dwellings the water was several inches deep in the cellars. Sidewalks on Tenth street were washed away and the roadbed was badly damaged.

Ter's ice cream pavilion had a narrow escape from total destruction, during Tuesday evening of last week.

Railroad Tickets Good Till Used.

It is said that Mr. H. P. Baldwin, general passenger agent of the New Jersey Central road, was asked the other day why it was that the condition, printed on the excursion tickets of his road, that the return coupon must be used within [illegible] days, was not enforced.

"That is only a precautionary provision," said Mr. Baldwin. "We do not now think it is necessary to limit local tickets to any particular time, [illegible] we keep the notice there so that if we should ever wish to do so we could [illegible] cost. To have the limit printed on our tickets in such a case would involve a great expense. We keep constantly on hand at our various offices, the general ticket office included, anywhere from five to six million tickets. It would require some time, also, to put that number of tickets through the press. Under the present system, the limit could be enforced on twenty-four hours' notice."

Mr. Baldwin also said that tickets were frequently taken up by conductors long after the date of sale. One was turned in the other day to him that had been issued over ten years ago.

—The recent storm washed out deep gullies in the roadbed on both [illegible] and that thoroughfare [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible].

Let This Be Done.

The way to stop the overflowing of Green Brook forever, is to enlarge its course through the city's limits. Enlarge it to four times its present size, properly bank it, and Plainfield will never know another freshet and the papers that [illegible] the city so much harm with exaggerated accounts of great damage by water, will be silenced for all time.

A Bad Cut.

Mr. George VanBlake, a member of Cyrene Commandery, colored Knights Templar, cut his hand very badly, Thursday, but Dr. Hodges sewed and dressed it in a manner that will assure speedy recovery.

VanBlake, who is Mr. Wm. Bloodgood's coachman, was opening a jar of preserved fruit for his employer's family at their residence on Belvidere avenue. The jar broke and the glass cut a deep gash the entire length of his hand.

The New President Chosen From Plainfield.

At the annual meeting of the New Jersey State Sportsman's Association, held at Newark, N. J., on Monday, the following were selected as officers of the Association for the ensuing year:

President—[illegible], of the Jersey City Heights Gun Club.
Vice President—Spencer G. Smith, of the Hackberry Gun Club.
Recording Secretary—Jacob Pentz, of the Newark Gun Club.
Corresponding Secretary—W. R. Hobart, of the [illegible] Gun Club.
Treasurer—W. Fred Quimby, of the Middlesex Gun Club.

A Song Writer in a Pulpit.

(From Monday's Elizabeth Journal.)

Rev. Dr. Robert Lowry, of Plainfield, author of "Shall we gather at the river?" and a large number of the finest Sunday school hymns, occupied the desk of the Central Baptist church yesterday morning and last evening, in the absence of the pastor, Rev. R. T. Tomlinson, Ph. D., who was called to the upper part of New York State last week by the illness of one of his children. Dr. Lowry has preached in this church on a previous occasion. His sermons yesterday were very vigorous, and were listened to with much interest.

Caught by Bowes.

There is no doubt now left in the minds of the base ball public that Bowes is a great catcher. Last Saturday during the third inning, the horse of G. Schlereth attached to an open wagon standing in right field, dumped the occupants out in the dirt, upset the wagon and raced across towards third base kicking the whiffletree to pieces.

The Crescents were in the field at the time, and were joined by the crowd in a wild attempt to seize the frantic horse that was entangled in one of the shafts, dashing through the air, and throwing out his heels in all directions. But Bowes [illegible] from the back stop, caught the horse in left field ahead of second baseman [illegible].

Bowling at Dunellen.

The Middlesex Bowling Green Club went to Dunellen on Friday last to contest a game with gentlemen of Newark and those representing the Dunellen Club. The clubs selected four competitors each. The first game was abruptly stopped by the downpour of rain, when the score was [illegible].

The second game Middlesex secured by one point.

On Saturday next the Middlesex Club will meet at Dunellen for practice, and on Thursday, October 3, they will play the Dunellen club for the Hamilton silver cup. [illegible] now holds this prize having secured the trophy two years in succession.

How a PRESS Carrier Reported a Local Casualty.

Master Myrle Sutphen, one of THE PRESS' carriers, handed in the following on his way to school Friday morning. The conciseness of detail is most commendable.

BITTEN BY A DOG.

Mr. Ross of West Front street was bitten by a dog on Central avenue, last evening, while delivering some orders for L. Heynigor of Somerset street where he is employed.

He is confined to his house. It was a very bad bite and may prove serious. He is also a member of No. 3 Engine company. He has two sons, a girl, and he and his wife.

To Astonish the Natives.

There is a possibility as mentioned before in THE PRESS, that some of the members of Troop A, N. G. S. N. Y.,—formerly the "First Dragoons," of New York city—will go into camp for a few days early in October, near the Park avenue residence of Mr. John I. Holly, who is a Corporal of the Troop.

Other members of this swell cavalry organization of the great metropolis, are Mr. Percy C. Ohl, of this city, and Messrs. Oliver Bridgman, George Ryer, the Messrs. Eckert and others of The Netherwood's Summer guests. The Troop may be given a ball at the Hotel if they come, and will possibly attend church in a body besides astonishing the natives with a dress parade through the city's streets.

The Coal Combine Works Both Ways.

Mr. Newton R. Saxton, who recently leased from the estate of L. A. Bloomer, the coal bins and business on Front street, [illegible] of the railroad bridge, was notified Monday by Mr. Stewart Hoffman, the Central railroad's agent, that he could have no more coal. The cause was this:

Mr. Saxton was not a member of the Combine formed among the coal dealers of this city. Consequently, unless he joined the "trust" and obeyed its rules, he would not be permitted to do business. Thus if he joined with them, he was not allowed to employ anyone to solicit orders. Therefore as Mr. Saxton had engaged Mr. Bloomer to solicit orders, the Plainfield Coal Exchange sent word to headquarters and Mr. Saxton's supply was stopped.

Thus was Saxton compelled to agree to the iron clad rules of the Combine and stop soliciting through others; so now he will be permitted to have coal to sell again.

A Mad Dog Scare.

Quite an excitement was created Tuesday [illegible] week in vicinity of Stony Hill by the report of a mad dog being at large. A big yellow brindle ran into Mr. Carter's yard in Washington Valley and bit two of that gentleman's dogs severely. Before guns could be procured the dog made his escape, going in the direction of Berkeley Heights, where there is a public school that the children of the vicinity attend.

A young lady, Miss Layton, volunteered to warn the teacher of the impending danger to the scholars, as most of them were likely to come in the direction the dog had gone. Mounting her saddle horse Miss Layton rode to the school house and delivered her message. While on her way back the horse became frightened at something and ran away. Miss Layton kept her seat in the saddle, but was not able to check the speed of the frightened animal until near Mercer's corner, when he stumbled on some loose stones and threw the brave girl to the ground, which bruised and stunned her badly. Kind neighbors brought her to a house nearby, where she received the kindest attention until her parents could be informed and she could be taken home. Miss Layton is still confined to her home, suffering from the shock and bruises.

The dog had not been seen since. He had a collar and chain attached to him, showing he broke away from some house.

STILL UNDECIDED.

The tennis tournament for the Plainfield championship in gentlemen's doubles, postponed until Saturday last as exclusively announced in THE PRESS, was then played on the Central avenue grounds of the Plainfield Club and resulted in a most interesting series of games so closely contested that darkness left the tournament still undecided.

The first round was won by S. McCutchen and J. Van Deventer, against Wm. Murray and W. B. Richards: 6-4 and 6-2. Wadsworth and Wotherspoon won against Walter Murray and H. W. Beebe: 6-2 and 6-1.

C. L. Goodrich and L. Goodrich, won against H. West and R. A. Beebe: 5-6, 6-4, 6-2. These were the most exciting sets of the tournament. Messrs. West and Beebe played a remarkably plucky game against their older opponents—making some almost impossible returns. Especially praiseworthy was the play of Beebe who was the youngest competitor in the tournament but who played like a veteran. He was enthusiastically applauded.

While the above sets were going on, Augustus Wadsworth and David Wotherspoon won against McCutchen and Van Deventer: 5-6, 6-4, 6-2. In the final match between Wadsworth and Wotherspoon, against the Goodrich Bros., the former won the first set, 6-5, and were 2-0 on the second set when play was stopped on account of the darkness.

FAREWELL TO THE C. L. S. C.

The Business Offices of the Chautauqua University to be Removed From This City Where It was Conceived and Started.

As already told in THE PRESS, the offices of the Chautauqua University will be moved about the 1st of February from this city to Buffalo, yet the following gleaned by a reporter in regard to the local department here, has still some interest to Plainfielders. The university was started in 1878 in the study here of Doctor, now Bishop, John H. Vincent. In a year it was too big for the study and was moved into a corner room of THE PRESS building. Then students began coming in such troops that the university had to crowd out the tenants in the other offices to find accommodations for its 60,000 members. By the time a hundred thousand students had been enrolled, the university held complete possession of the entire second floor. Twenty thousand new students who joined last year made the quarters dreadfully cramped, however, and the officers were getting ready to move into bigger and more convenient quarters in the new Y. M. C. A. building where the students, or the documents representing them, wouldn't have to bunk together from the floor to the ceiling, and where they might be lulled to sleep every night by the hymn singing, when word came from Chautauqua for the secretary and assistants to pack up their trunks and decamp to Buffalo.

The trustees of the university want to centralize their work. At present the offices of most of the Chautauqua schools are located in Plainfield, but the Chautauqua College of Liberal Arts is at New Haven, the Chautauqua Assembly has its offices in Syracuse, and the publishing house is in New York. Bishop Vincent has his present home in Buffalo. Francis H. Root, one of Buffalo's wealthy residents, is a trustee of the university. Lewis Miller, the President, lives in Akron, Ohio. Clem Studebaker, the carriage maker, and another trustee, lives in South Bend, Ind. Altogether, Buffalo is very convenient to the homes of the members of the Board of Directors. Another reason why it has been selected is that it is only three hours' ride from Buffalo to Chautauqua Lake. It is not likely, however, that the publishing house, which prints 300,000 Chautauqua books a year, will be moved from New York.

Plainfield is naturally sorry to lose the university. For years it has been a pride of the town. It has made the little Post Office among the richest in the State. The university circulars have carried the name of Plainfield to every town and hamlet in the country, and to China, England, and Japan. Old residents liked to point out the offices to strangers and say, "That their institution has a hundred thousand students; yes, sir, a hundred thousand students."

If the stranger hops up stairs to the offices, eager to find where all the hundred thousand students are, he is greeted by Miss K. F. Kimball, the Secretary of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, who runs everything about the offices. Miss Kimball is a pleasant-faced, keen-eyed young lady.

"A great deal that is said about Chautauqua," she says, "is exaggerated, and these exaggerations hurt us. We have no desire to seem to be what we are not. As a matter of fact, something like a hundred thousand have at one time or another joined the Literary and Scientific Circle. But of this number only about fifty or sixty thousand are actual students, that is, read the books required and send in reports of their reading. Even this number is a fluctuating one. Students are constantly leaving and enrolling. The classes organized each year average about 20,000, and of this number about one-fourth will read the entire four years' course, send in examination papers and full reports of work done and graduate."

The visitor is shown through the offices to the student's dormitories. The dormitories are in a big safe, six feet high and three feet square. There are big and little books in the safe, most of them between the green covers of ledger books. Pulling out a whole section at a time, one reads on the cover: "Class of 1892, A to J." The students are arranged alphabetically by name. The first name probably reads, "Aaron, Amelia A., Aaronsville, Arizona." After the names in the proper columns are mysterious signs which when interpreted read, "Housekeeper, age between 20 and 30, Presbyterian." In another column, Miss Aaron is credited with the annual fee of 50 cents. There are more columns to mark Miss Aaron's progress in the payment of fees, her studies, examination papers, and reports. If she is a good girl and reads her forty minutes a day, she gets a parchment diploma at the end of the four years. The books containing Miss Aaron's and the other hundreds of names of the students would be worth a fortune to an advertising circular man. But they are religiously guarded and not even temperance orators or literary lecturers are allowed to copy from them.

The correspondence method of home reading, which is the basis of the university, is easily understood. After enrollment, the student is told what books to read. Papers calculated to keep him in his studies and keep his enthusiasm up are sent out twice or three times a year. He is allowed the largest latitude. He makes no pledge or promise on joining. He reads just as he pleases. He may even substitute other books for the required ones, provided they cover the same subject and are of equal length. He may help the society along by paying the annual fee of 50 cents and not doing a stroke of study. Or he may make five dollars' worth of bother for the clerks by wanting his name transferred to another class every month or so and asking questions already answered in the circulars which have been sent him.

Rheumatism is caused by a poisonous acid in the blood and yields to Ayer's Pills. Many cases which seemed chronic and hopeless, have been completely cured by this medicine. It will cost but little to try what effect the Pills may have in your case. We predict success.

"Make Plainfield Fix Her End."

A Scotch Plains correspondent writes: "And while you are about it, gentlemen of Scotch Plains, men of property, spend some money yourselves to improve your property. Trees should be planted in Park avenue. Stir up your officials. They are enterprising men and ready to second any effort you may make in the direction of the improvement of the village or the township at large. Make Plainfield fix her end of the Terrill road that has not been worked for four years and is sadly in need of repairs. (Plainfield papers please copy). Come gentlemen, wake up; kick off the bedclothes; dress yourselves; eat a good breakfast and go to work to make a town. You've got the tools to work with!"

PLAINFIELD KNIGHTS AT TRENTON.

A number of the members of Crescent Division, Uniformed Rank, Knights of Pythias, of this city, took part Monday at Trenton in the annual State parade. The Plainfield Division, under command of Capt. Horace J. Martin, attracted much attention by their fine marching and personal appearance.

Among the State officers at the head of the divisions were Lieut. Col., George H. Pellmann and Quartermaster John C. VanDyke, of this city. With the notables in carriages, rode Grand Priest, John Ulrich, and Grand Keeper of Records and Seals, Eugene V. Lorton, also of Plainfield. At the conclusion of the parade, all partook of a banquet in Masonic Temple followed by a grand ball in honor of the Knights.

Unwilling Witnesses in the Liquor Cases, Punished.

The city is having trouble in compelling the attendance of the witnesses subpoenaed for the prosecution of parties arrested for selling liquor without a license. But Chief Carey and the Court propose to put the screws on them if they do not attend when the case is set down.

On Monday, when the Sullivan case came up again, the witnesses that had been picked out by the city were again absent. As soon as the case was adjourned, however, they appeared with all sorts of excuses for being late. But it did not work.

Richard O'Neil, one of the unwilling witnesses, was fined $20 for contempt of Court. Wm. Ross, another of the same kind, was put under $200 bonds and may eventually be taken to the county jail for the same offense.

Chief Carey says, if they think they can form a combination against him, he'll soon show them how mistaken they are. He does not propose that anyone shall make a fool of him.

Mr. S. A. Haines Talks to a Reform Hall Audience.

There was a goodly audience in Reform Hall Sunday evening. Vice Pres. Harper and Mr. Vanderbeek with a full choir, were at their posts of duty. Mr. Samuel A. Haines, of Netherwood, conducted the devotional services, and afterwards delivered one of the most able and interesting addresses ever listened to.

To appreciate Mr. Haines as a speaker one must hear him, as no report can do justice to his eloquent and well chosen words. His subject last evening was, as publicly announced—"Three views of Home," the history of each home referred to being founded on facts, and all depicting the awful results of moderate drinking, ending in drunkenness, and the consequent wreck of home happiness, manly dignity and worldly prosperity.

Mr. Haines further portrayed the great and good effects conferred upon individuals and families through taking and keeping the pledge of total abstinence from liquor of every kind. His appeal in behalf of the pledge was very earnest and touching. The highly interesting meeting closed with the doxology.

The Acme's Lose Gately, and Gately Loses the Game.

Sixteen base-hits off of Gately, with a triple and four doubles tell the reason of the Crescents fourth defeat of the season. Saturday was a cold day for Plainfield in the field and the grand stand, and the joints of Patrick's arm were numb while he wore a frapped smile.

The Acmes proved themselves the finest team that ever trod the Plainfield diamond. But one little error marred the perfect game, they put up in the field, and they batted Gately when and where they pleased.

Had it not been for the good support of the Crescents, the score might have been twenty to two. Eleven flies—of which McLaughlin and McMurray captured seven—were good for as many more runs had not the Crescents, in spite of the gale that blew across the field, judged them just right. Bowes also played a great game. Not an Acme reached second except on a hit.

The visitors were first at the bat. Kenneth reached first on a hit, but was thrown out at second by Bowes. Hatfield flew out to McMurray, and Lever followed with a two bagger. He came home with an earned run on Heiser's single while the latter reached second on McLaughlin's error in fielding the ball. Heiser was subsequently thrown out trying to reach home, but Cadmus decided him safe although Heiser saw he was out and made no pretense of touching the plate. Bowes protested, and Gately sulked—and the latter then hit Wade, gave W. Paasch his base on balls, and Moran brought everybody home on a three bagger. The inning, which was played throughout in a cold driving rain storm, closed with five runs for the Acmes instead of one.

The Crescents' first resulted in two runs. Lee went out, from Heiser to W. Paasch. McMurray got his first on balls and reached third on a passed ball, but was caught off the bag by a quick throw of Hatfield's. Hammill was hit by the ball, Bowes got his first and second on an error by Heiser, and both came home on Gately's hit. Herniff flew out to Heiser, and the Crescents' run getting closed for the day.

Thereafter, until the seventh inning, no one scored. Then the Acmes added three to their total by singles of Hatfield and Heiser, an error of Randolph's and W. Paasch's two bagger. In the eight, singles by A. Paasch and Lever, and a double by Hatfield, gave the visitors two more runs. The score was:

POOR WILLIE HAMILTON.

About two years ago, little Willie Hamilton, living near Union Village, a few miles from this city, while playing in a spring wagon with his younger sister, lost his balance and fell to the ground, striking on his back. His father being compelled to leave his house very early in the morning in order to be at his work at the paper mills, three miles away, and his mother having died before the accident, no one knew of the accident and Willie did not say anything about it.

The Sunday following, his father noticed that Willie was not so lively as usual, and asked the cause. Although loth to tell—for Willie promised his little sister not to, as they were forbidden to get on the wagon to play—he confessed how he had fallen off the wagon. Surgical aid was then summoned, but of no avail.

Spinal disease set in, and little Willie has not been able to walk since. His father is away all day at work at present on the railroad; his little sister goes to school; and his older sister, who keeps house, must needs go to the village store frequently for necessaries. So little Willie, while bravely trying to be patient, is often left alone with nothing to amuse him or to while away the tedious hours.

You little folks of Plainfield living in kind Christian homes, have you not some little toy you can spare for little Willie? The editor of THE PRESS will receive and forward any favor you may contribute.

NO SOMERSET STREET BRIDGE YET.

Tuesday the joint committee of the Board of Freeholders of Union and Somerset counties, met in Plainfield to open the proposals advertised for and to give out the contract to construct a truss or girder bridge of Somerset street over Green Brook. But after three hours' consideration and discussion of the many bids received, the meeting adjourned without result.

Somerset's Board had passed a resolution to build a truss bridge, while Union's Board was in favor of a girder bridge. The former was the cheaper, but the latter's difference in cost of about $1,200 would be saved in a few years because there would be no planked roadway to frequently repair. Then, besides, the girder bridge was the most preferable in every way, and the city's representatives were in favor of the best for the locality, while the Borough's representatives wanted to save money by putting up the more unsightly structure.

There were all kinds of bids in all kinds of ways. The Berlin Bridge Company offered to build a girder bridge of iron, with brick arches filled in with concrete and a macadam roadway, complete for $3,900. The New Jersey Steel and Iron Company's bid was $2,150 for just the iron work of a girder bridge without side railings. This was fifty dollars less than the bid of Dean & Westbrook for the same work, but the latter's bid was twenty-five dollars less than the N. J. Steel and Iron company proposal, including the railings.

There was only one way to settle this difficulty. These two firms alone were instructed to present new bids for the entire work of construction of the bridge itself, including building and filling in the arches, and laying macadamized roadway. Meanwhile the Somerset county members will try and persuade their Board to pay its share of a girder bridge.

How the Son of a Former Plainfield Minister Got Himself Married for Nothing.

Almost everybody in Plainfield remembers Harry Day, son of the Rev. William Day, for so many years the beloved pastor of the M. E. church of this city. During his early residence in Plainfield Harry was quite a lamb and his wool was of, at least, a light color; but he developed eventually into a very black sheep.

He made one or two bad breaks here, but ostensibly reformed and led the young people's prayer meetings with a zeal and fervency that brought tears to the eyes of his companions. After he left Plainfield, however, he went rapidly to the bad. His latest exploit was to present a forged draft as a marriage fee. The story is about as follows:

Pastor Freund, of Hoboken, who has married more couples since the beginning of the year than any other clergyman in Hudson county, was shamefully imposed upon in the early part of this month by Day.

On the 4th inst. Rev. Mr. Freund was sitting in his library at his residence, No. 136 Hudson street, when a tall, fashionably dressed young man, accompanied by a stylish-looking young woman, was ushered into his presence. The pastor recognized the man as Harry C. Day, the only son of Rev. Wm. Day, of Trinity church, Newark. The visitors said that they wished to be married. The nuptial knot was tied, the lady giving her name as Mrs. Loretta Sterling, nee Cranston, of No. 51 West Twelfth street, New York City. After the certificate was made out and handed to the bride the groom drew a draft from his pocketbook. It bore the signature of Snow, Church & Co., of No. 365 Broadway, New York. It was drawn in favor of "Pastor John W. Freund," and was for $11. Day handed this to the clergyman, remarking:

"Retain $6 for your services and advertising and kindly let me have the change."

"I'm not sure that this is all right," remarked Mr. Freund.

"Oh, yes it is. I am employed by Messrs Snow, Church & Co., as collector," was the reply.

"Then I'll give you the change when the draft is honored," said the clergyman.

The bridegroom said Mr. Freund might keep the draft and then left. The next morning the draft was sent to the First National Bank, Hoboken, and on the 9th inst., it was returned to Pastor Freund as "no good." He then wrote to Snow, Church & Co., and yesterday the clergyman received the following letter:

SNOW, CHURCH & CO.
365 BROADWAY.
CRAWFORD & MURPHY, Counsel.
NEW YORK, Sept. 18, 1889.

Rev. J. W. Freund, 136 Hudson street, Hoboken, N. J.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of yours of the 16th in reference to the draft left with you by H. C. Day, and on which we presume you have paid him some money. Mr. Day is no longer in our employ. In reply we are unable to give you any definite information as to his financial responsibility. Will you kindly return us the draft left with you? Yours truly,

SNOW, CHURCH & CO.

Pastor Freund wrote to Day's father in Newark, telling him of the occurrence. When seen by a reporter last night the clergyman said:

"Young Day played a mean trick on me. If he had asked me to marry him for nothing I would have done so willingly, but he wanted to make a big showing before his bride, the foolish fellow. His father was a well known Methodist minister in this city. He was pastor of the First M. E. church before the present incumbent, and is now very popular in Newark."

While Harry C. Day resided in Hoboken he was always well supplied with money. He led a gay life, and was compelled to absent himself for a year. After returning he had some shady moneyed transactions with Messrs. Wiggins and Abel of Washington street, Hoboken, but his father settled the difficulty and the matter was hushed up.

Pastor Freund said he would not prosecute the man, but he believes that Snow, Church & Co., will.

—B. H. K.—I shall raise on your board after Tuesday.
B.—Why?
B. H. K.—Because you are using Dr. Dean's Remedy, and eat twice as much as you formerly did.

"ROCK" NEWSPAPER.

"Rock" Its Name, but, Rocker Would Have Been More Appropriate.

The New York World of last Sunday said truly that the old inhabitants in the little village of Dunellen, on the line of the Jersey Central Railroad, will have some lively incidents to recall when the 10th of November comes around. In the Summer of 1877 among the boarders in the village was a Mrs. McGeachy, from Philadelphia, and her son, who liked best to be called "Mac." "Mac" was a newspaper man whose journalistic instincts were irrepressible. He had founded and wrecked a daily newspaper in Danbury, Conn. Another brilliant venture in the Quaker City he brought to the same end.

He was aged thirty by this time and appeared before the villagers as a result of his enterprise, with a look of untold suffering from dyspepsia, a weak chest and the top of his head as shiny and expansive as his boots. The boots were very large and much walking had turned up the toes like the shoes in the queer pictures of Chinese mandarins. His fiercely trained Napoleonic mustache did not invite acquaintance, but it was not long before "Mac" had sized up the village and destroyed his mother's hope for a quiet and peaceful old age by founding another newspaper. On the 10th of November appeared the first number of the Dunellen Rock. "C. R. A. McGeachy, 'Mac,' Editor and Proprietor. Price $2 per annum. 5 cents a copy; no pay, no paper."

A little shanty, still standing on Prospect avenue, by the railroad, was the editorial office and composing room of the Rock. The aims of the paper were much larger than the shanty. Dunellen, in fact, could not contain the ambitions of its editor and "Mac" spread himself out and determined to make the Rock the official newspaper of Somerville, Bound Brook, Plainfield and a dozen other towns on the lines of the Central and Pennsylvania railroads. It took eight pages, twenty-four columns of advertisements and local news, to satisfy "Mac" on this score, and twenty-four columns more of stories and poems were added for the delectation of the country bumpkins. A big blot three inches deep across the first page, under the heading, was supposed to be an accurate engraving of the village of Dunellen. Those were the days when photo-engraving was in its infancy, but "Mac" prided himself on the artistic taste of his headline. A description of the village was under the headline. Of course "the publication office of the Rock is within sight down the main street in view; the editor has just stepped out, which accounts for his absence."

Half of Dunellen village wanted to edit the Rock. The town magnates would saunter into the shanty in a leisurely way, inspect the copy and proofs on the hooks, bother the printers and pour their suggestions into "Mac's" unwilling ears. Finally they were got rid of by putting some copy on the hooks which made them turn red in the face and leave the shanty with injured looks. Another inconvenience was to have a fire break out in the editorial den and burn up half the copy for the week's issue.

It was the news columns and editorial policy of the Rock which will make McGeachy remembered in New Jersey journalism. "Write funny" was the standing rule of the office. Later another rule was added: "Sting somebody every time you get a chance." Truth was thrown out of the window, and sensation and humorous extravagance had full play. When nobody else was handy "Mac" stung himself and his reporters to make his columns lively. The wildest statements were permitted in the chronicling of local happenings, provided they were funny.

This is how local events were chronicled:

Col. Sam Van Arsdale has amassed wealth enough to add a pleasing two-story wing to his dwelling.

We hear of a very happy engagement quite a distance around the corner, after a brief Greco-Roman tussle about it. Particulars on receipt of a postal card to either dove.

Dr. Endicott's little mare can now make her tails in four seconds better time. She has been clipped by Prof. Cumback and consequently can cut the air with less friction.

Hell hath no fury like a woman left behind by the Central Railroad. It was the 2:45 P. M. train Monday. Station Agent Carpenter remembers her impassioned observations distinctly.

Hon. A. L. Force, of the Constitutionalist, visited the Rock office Wednesday. Nothing has been missed from the office since he left except our spectacles.

On Tuesday evening Sam Sabbarton fell through his pantaloons in an attempt to enter good Jack Coleman's back at the depot without customary assistance. Jack looks away to the East in silence when the episode recurs to him.

The voracity with which a newly engaged pair kissed each other adieu at the depot last Wednesday morning was enough to cause the unseen stars to peer forth through the blazing sunlight and scream "Scat!"

Hundreds were turned away from the doors of the Green Brook school house Wednesday evening, assembled to hear P. M. Bergen's advertised "Welcome to Spring." Over $1,500 was taken in at the door.

Theatrical circles in Bunelle are stirred tumultuously over the disappearance of Will Saltzer, of the Dramatic Club. The cruel rumor that a servant girl is also missing is unfounded for our reporter has counted all the servant girls in town and finds that the total foots up correctly.

The Rock's circulation took a sudden rise when a new department appeared on the first page under the head of "Rock Candy." These are some of the items:

Plainfield.—It is a boy, and when he gets married his wife will order the [illegible] to be sent to F. T. Marsh.

Dunellen.—Paul Kraisel, our enterprising shoemaker, has the youngest customer in town, one, too, who will patronize him exclusively for years to come, we hope. She began her account Tuesday morning.

Somerville.—One swallow does not make a Summer, but one little Bobby has made Spring weather for Ben Somerville. Isn't so very little, either; 11½ avoirdupois gross.

Dunellen.—Mr. Carter will take $25 for it, regardless of what veal may be worth for the next thirty days. There isn't a prettier calf on Prospect avenue. It is just a week old today.

About this time, when the circulation of his eccentric paper had reached 2,000 copies a week, "Mac" began to reap his harvest of libel suits. One day the editorials were full of magnificent promises of a future brilliant and kaleidoscopic journal, and the Rock disappeared. McGeachy disappeared also, leaving a tender remembrance in the shape of an unpaid bill in the hands of his head reporter. The last that Dunellen ever heard of the man who had jogged it for a year out of its usual sleepy existence was that he had married an actress, who knew how old he was and with her was managing a traveling theatrical company.

The Case of Mr. Watson.

Michael F. Watson, who has been arrested on the charge of keeping a disorderly house in the vicinity of the Pond Works, and of selling liquor therein without a license, emphatically denies that his brother-in-law, John McFadden, got any liquor at his place the night he (McFadden) was run over by the cars.

Watson, who is President of the Brotherhood of Iron Workers, says he only sells cigars, tobacco, soda and ginger ale. Every evening, he says, a lot of the members of the Union gather at his place, treat one another to smokes and soft drinks, and talk politics. His trial, set down for Monday afternoon, has been adjourned until next Monday at 10 o'clock A. M., and the Hon. Fred. Marsh will defend him.

A rumor in musical circles just now is to the effect that Miss Haines, of Netherwood—whose piano performances THE PRESS has had occasion often to praise so highly—Miss Ada March and Miss May, are arranging a series of parlor musicales to be given during the coming season at private houses in this city. A violin and 'cello to be added, will permit the rendition of most pleasing programmes, but ten dollars, the price per ticket, is probably rather more than it will be worth.

A Coming Musical.

The choir of the Crescent Avenue church are arranging for a musical, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the amount which they volunteered to raise toward the building fund. Some of the finest talent of New York city has already volunteered.

We Pause, Too.

(From the Central Times.)

Some members of the council oppose a proposition to allow the Hall Pump Co., to stretch wires about the city to connect with their electric pumps. One reason given is that the city is to have water works and there will be no need of such pumps. Is that the way people are to be bulldozed into using aqueduct water? We pause for a reply.

Musical.

It is a great satisfaction to notice a growing demand in this city for first-class concerts. The programmes of the Vendome chamber music concerts this season will be entirely new and of a higher order even than last season's. The prices of admission to these concerts are popular prices within the reach of all. The subscription lists are now open at Reynolds' and Shaw's pharmacies.

Building Loan.

At the Directors' meeting of the Plainfield Building and Loan Association, held Monday, Sept. 16, the Secretary submitted semi-annual statements of the assets and liabilities of each series, as of record on the 20th of August, and which showed the Association to be steadily growing in financial strength.

The officers are:

President—Joseph [illegible]
Vice President—Lewis E. [illegible]
Treasurer—William E. [illegible]
Secretary—Nathan Harper.
Solicitor—John M. Jackson.
Finance Committee—John [illegible], [illegible], Wm. E. [illegible]

A Sad Case of Absent-Mindedness.

Recently a well-known gentleman of East Fifth street, who up to a late hour had been busily engaged writing, picked up some scraps of paper from the table and proceeded to the kitchen for the purpose of burning them up. He lifted a lid from the range in which there was a red-hot fire, and turning around ignited the papers by the flame of the gas and threw them in the range, burning his fingers in the act.

It was some time before he realized what a ridiculous thing he had done and requested that no mention of it be made to a living soul. We will therefore keep quiet.

Resolved, That we tender to his afflicted family our sincere condolence and earnest sympathy in their affliction and great loss.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased Brother, and published in THE PRESS and Central Times.

A Peculiar Accident.

An accident of a peculiar nature happened in Mr. H. J. Martin's blacksmith shop on Somerset street, about 8 o'clock Friday morning, but fortunately no one was injured. At that time an employee was fanning the fire in the forge, when the bellows filled with coal gas, and exploded with terrific force. The noise made by the explosion could be heard a block away. The bellows was completely wrecked.

A [illegible].

Poor Plainfield! We offer some of our surplus stream help lift the little town to a level with the surface of the earth. The town suffered on the 17th from another freshet. We trust that our neighbor's danger overdrawn at Feltville Dam, will not empty its threatening contents unawares upon the slumbering town. No doubt there are many wicked people there, but we believe in giving even that class a chance to flee to the mountains. It ought to have a location among the habitable places of the earth.—[illegible].

Thanks, neighbor! You can keep your dirt—we never use it. And have no fear about the Feltville Dam. She's all right! The painters have been up and put another coat of white lead on it, the terrible leaks have been stopped with unread copies of the dying news, and the "bulge" has been straightened by the exertions of "couriers on horse back."

HOME AGAIN.

A letter was received Tuesday by Mrs. M. W. Leonard from Miss Lina Fliege, who reached Prussia in safety, enclosing a card of thanks to the people of this place who befriended her when she was here in a destitute condition a few weeks ago. Mrs. Leonard has furnished THE PRESS with the following translation of Miss Fliege's card:

"Now that I am happily returned to my native country, I take occasion to express again my profoundest feelings of gratitude to the generous, philanthropic people of Plainfield and North Plainfield who helped me out of my great exigency by so large a money donation. To their magnanimity I owe it that I have not only returned home reconciled to the terrible fate which befell me in America, but also that I am enabled to go forth courageously to meet the future which is insured for some time against destitution. The Lord our God, who has promised not to have him unrewarded who gives the cup of cold water to the thirsty one in His name, bless the good done me to all the givers with earthly and heavenly blessing, according to the richness of His grace.

LINA FLIEGE.

Spandau, Sept. 9, 1889.

A Bereaved Woman Forced to Protect Her Dead Husband From the Slander of the "News."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—The evening news of this city, with its usual disregard for truth and to satisfy its well-known propensity for slandering our citizens, in its issue of Sept. 12,—in an article headed, "Chas. E. Hobby, Dead. Sorrow and Sickness at last Overcame Him."—put before the public an article teeming with lies and misrepresentations that I wish to set in their true light through your valuable and truth loving paper.

The first deliberate lie is that Chas. Hobby died at the residence of Mark Loos, on West Second street. Mr. Mark Loos live on Chatham street, North Plainfield, and Chas. Hobby died at his own residence, rented by him for his family, on East Second street. The next referred to—while the father whose lips were sealed in death lay in his coffin awaiting burial—was the scandal with which the daughter's name became connected some time ago. This news—a viper in human form—says Mr. Hobby was greatly troubled over his daughter's conduct and drove her from the house. The father pardoned his daughter's offense, and instead of driving her from the house, she continued to live at home with him till the family removed to Paterson, where she went with them. Many of our citizens have seen her riding on the streets of our city with her father since that time.

Lie No. 3—that a family quarrel resulted and the mother sold the house and went to reside in Paterson on the proceeds of said sale. Who told this lying news all this, or is it only the promptings of its own black heart? It is true the family moved to Paterson into rooms rented for them by Mr. Hobby himself. The house was sold at his urgent request and of the proceeds the goodly portion was retained by him.

Lie 4th—that his wife was sent for against his wishes. Mr. Editor, lying upon my table as I write this is a postal card, the last written by Mr. Hobby to his wife in Paterson, urging her to come back to Plainfield to live, and that upon a favorable answer from her he will secure rooms and send Mr. Geo. Conover to bring her goods to Plainfield. As to the check for eight hundred dollars, Mr. Winckler denies receiving a check for any such sum.

Let us draw a veil over the inhuman and cowardly conduct of a paper that would assail the reputation of the living during such a sad bereavement and on the eve of the father's burial. Let us drop a tear of sympathy with the living. Children! there is the grave of your father. You have recently heard the clods of the Valley [illegible] upon his coffin. The parent stem from which you grew and to which you fondly clung, has been shattered by the lightning stroke of death and its terrible shock is now felt in every fiber of the wrenched and torn branches. Yours is now a widowed and an orphaned home. The disconsolate members are left helpless and hopeless in the world. The widowed mother sits by the dying embers of her lonely rooms overwhelmed with grief and poor in everything but her children and her God. These orphans are turned out upon the cold charities of an unfriendly world, neglected and forlorn, having no one to care for them but a poor broken-hearted mother; and in this enlightened age and in this Christian community, you see the sad spectacle of these orphans being assailed by a cowardly, sneaking, inhuman newspaper. Mr. Editor, the time is not far distant when silence on the part of an outraged public will cease to be a virtue, and Plainfield, like some other localities, will not be a pleasant home for the news.

Respectfully yours,
MRS. HOBBY.

Saturday's Game.

The Winthrops, with the Currie Bros., battery, will again play the Crescents in this city next Saturday afternoon. Plainfield shut them out before, but the visitors propose to avenge themselves this time.

Mr. Schenck's People Brave the Storm to Greet Him.

Tuesday night was the occasion of the regular church reception of the Trinity Reformed congregation, but it was made an especially momentous and enjoyable event because it was the first social gathering of Mr. Schenck's people since his return from Europe. The arrangements for the affair were in the hands of the officers of the Ladies' Christian Work Society of the church, and they acquitted themselves of the responsibility in a very commendable way. The lecture room where the reception was held, was trimmed by Mrs. Charles P. Leggett and her sister, Miss Jennie VanWinkle, in a handsome way that has never been excelled.

The rain storm of the evening served as a test of the people's devotion to their pastor. The room was uncomfortably filled with members of the church and congregation. There was no prescribed programme of entertainment—everything was informal, and general sociability was the order of the evening. The pastor was told it was the unanimous request of his friends there assembled, that he should give an account of his trip abroad, including the feelings he experienced in reading his "mail in mid ocean." He responded in a most entertaining way.

During the evening Miss Florence Randolph and another young lady pianist, played a duett with such good effect they were compelled to again favor the audience. Iced cream and other refreshments added to the pleasure of the evening.

BUILDING LOANS.

James Bishop, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor and Industries of New Jersey, devotes a considerable part of his report for 1888—just issued—to the building and loan associations of the State. In the way of statistics he says:

Our tables show that for 208 of the 210 associations in existence in the State on August 1, 1888, the total assets, averaging $70,862 to an association, or about $280 to a shareholder, amounted to $14,739,278, of which $2,569,853 was the net profit earned on the instalment investments. An annual income of $4,000,000 is evidenced by the aggregate number of outstanding shares, 239,385½ held by not less than 55,600 shareholders, or an average of 6.1 shares to a shareholder. Included among the shareholders were 123 associations or lodges. It is estimated that 75 per cent. of the shareholders are men, 20 per cent. women, and five per cent. minors, whose stock is held in the name of guardians or trustees. The rough estimates respecting about one-third of the number leads to the conclusion that nearly two-thirds (65 per cent.) of the shareholders must be wage-workers, the balance working for salary or being in business for themselves.

So far as the borrowing members are concerned, of whom, according to our returns, there were 9,965, or a ratio for the State of 1 to every 4.7 shareholders—a ratio which ranges from 1 to 11.1 in Bergen, to 1 to 2 in Warren county. Basing the calculations on the reports respecting about two-thirds of the total number, it seems that 80 per cent. of these borrowers are males and little over 50 per cent. wage-workers. From our returns it appears that out of 35,711 shareholders, 5,304 were paying for homes through the associations, or 1 in 6.7, which would give about 7,600 in the State—that is, 76 per cent. of the borrowers. Altogether, $14,052,853 were invested on bond and mortgage. That would be $1,400 as the amount of the average real estate loan, if loans were made to members only, which is not the case. But outside borrowers are rare, as are also any other kinds of investments except those in real estate, on mortgage and stock.

Some interesting statements in regard to the time taken to mature shares are given. In four associations, where only one series thus far has been closed up at maturity, the time taken has been:

Rutherford	in 120 months.
Lambertville	in 141 months.
Manasquan	in 126 months.
Phillipsburg, "No. 4"	in 126 months.

The Secretary of the Trenton "Mercer," which has been in existence since 1854, writes that the shortest time taken to close up a "class" was 128 months—some years ago, when premiums were high—but that 153 months had been required for the latest; during 1888 no premiums were obtained, all moneys having been sold at par.

A PASTOR'S WELCOME.

Trinity Reformed church, Sunday, was full of appropriate and auspicious welcome for its beloved pastor who had just returned in safety from an European tour. The floral display about the pulpit and platform was most beautiful to behold. A large white banner occupied a prominent position in front of the reading desk, and on it in red immortelles were these two texts: Heb., X, 23, last clause; Gen., XXVIII, 15.

All this was arranged by Mrs. J. C. VanDyke, Mrs. Wm. L. VanDeventer and other members of the Ladies' Church Work Society, who deserve much credit for their taste and indefatigable labors. Before the opening of the usual services, Organist A. L. Titsworth played soft and low, "Home, Sweet Home." It sent a thrill of sympathetic feeling through the hearts of people and pastor, and many an eye was wet with tears.

It was all so thorough a surprise to the Rev. Mr. Schenck, and affected him so, that he could hardly speak a word. Neither he nor Mrs. Schenck knew of what had been done in their absence, until they arrived at the church yesterday morning. They asked what it all meant. One answer—and the truest and best one—was, "Love!"

The exterior of the church has been repainted, and the interior entirely renovated. New carpets have been laid in the centre aisle and front. Handsome plush curtains hang from the choir rail. The pastor's study has been papered, painted and newly furnished throughout by the Ladies' Christian Work Society, presenting a most attractive appearance.

A new entrance to the lecture room has been built from the inside of the church. It is an improvement that has always been needed, and will be greatly appreciated by the Sunday school and prayer meeting goers.

At the opening of Sunday's services, Mr. Schenck said it was impossible under the circumstances for him to keep silent about what he had seen and felt that morning. "Pleasant surprises are always enjoyable," he continued, "but sometimes overwhelming, and it is impossible, my dear people, to tell you how much I appreciate all you have done. I cannot fittingly express my thanks.

"God is indeed faithful to his promises. A kind Providence has been following me all my journey and absence from you, my prayers have been answered, and everything has been working together for good. For your kind welcome to me and mine, I sincerely thank you."

The pastor then introduced the Rev. J. P. Searles, of Somerville, who preached an able sermon, taking his text from Matt., VIII., 2-3. There was a large attendance. Another special feature of the occasion was the vocal music by a quartette composed of Miss V. Bonnie Dale, soprano; Mrs. Elias Bird, contralto; Mr. D. J. Randall, tenor, and Mr. Robert Gorton, basso. In the morning the quartette sang Berg's "Jubilate Deo," and Miss Dale rendered "The Nativity" by Holden. Her solo in the evening was Gollinet's "Send Out Thy Light," and the quartette sang Dudley's "Gloria in Excelsis."

Catholic Associations Coming to this City.

The Young Men's Catholic Association of Morristown had arranged for an annual excursion to Newton, but has concluded to visit Plainfield on or about Oct. 15, in connection with the Elizabeth Association. Associations from Paterson and Newark will probably join with them.

"Twill Make Some Customers Squeal."

Ye who owe your grocers, prepare to pay them now! The Grocers Protective Association of Plainfield, is considering the plan of publishing the names of their delinquent customers and advertising their accounts for sale by auction. This is done in New York and possibly other States. The account is offered for the highest bidder and sold if only ten cents is bid.

"On Lower Broadway," New York.

The surging rush of pedestrians is frequently brought to a halt by crowds attracted to window displays.

At No. 245, directly opposite the Bridge landing, a display of London Made Melton Overcoats seems to be the most magnetic.

Mr. E. O. Thompson, the wide-awake Merchant Tailor and Clothier, who occupies these premises, is making himself unusually popular among good dressers. His low prices are as attractive as his novelties.

Considering all the good wrought by this firm any inconvenience to pedestrians must be overlooked.

GONE TO GERMANY.

In last Thursday's PRESS was first told the tale of the mysterious disappearance of Fred Richter, of Stirling. It was then supposed by friends and relatives that he might have been murdered, because he was a traveling collector for an insurance company and carried some money about him at times.

It is now believed by many that Richter is on his way to his native home, Germany, leaving behind at his late home a few miles Northwest of this city, a wife and family without means of support, and a number of debts.

In searching for Richter's body, it has been discovered that he sold in Summit the wagon and horse he was driving, after collecting a number of payments on insurance policies issued on the weekly instalment plan by the company for which he was an agent.

PRESIDENT FRENCH BOUND TO RESIGN.

An adjourned business meeting of the Reform Club was held Thursday, with Vice President Harper in the chair, and Mr. Hauersachs acting as Secretary.

After the customary opening exercises, Mr. Vanderbeek, Chairman of the Executive Committee, presented and read a communication from President John H. French positively declining to serve longer in that official capacity. Consequently, the former action of the club was reconsidered and the resignation accepted. By the wording of the Constitution the vacancy must be filled, for the unexpired time, at the next regular meeting, October 3.

Following the foregoing action, the Vice President was authorized to fill a vacancy in the Executive Committee, which he did by at once appointing ex-President French.

THE STREET RAILWAY QUESTION.

The citizens meeting called Friday evening, to confer with Mr. Leo Daft with reference to the proposed street railway was again postponed on account of the storm.

A few persons, however, were present at the Republican Association headquarters that evening, and listened attentively to Mr. Daft while he explained the workings of the storage battery system. Mr Childs, who was to have been present and explained the proposed mode of organizing a corporation, was unavoidably absent on account of illness.

Mr. Daft exhibited a sample of the steel rail, which is to be used in case the company is granted a franchise, and also illustrated its superiority over the other rails now in use in other cities.

During the evening Mr. Daft stated that it would cost $65,606 to build and equip the proposed four miles of track, and to meet this expense a capital stock of $75,000 would be issued.

Mr. Daft said that in the beginning four cars would be put in active service and that three additional cars would be held in reserve. In answer to a question concerning grades, Mr. Daft said that the heaviest grade to be encountered was on Clinton avenue and from the Peace street bridge up to the railroad station. These grades, he considered, were of no importance.

Facts Worth Knowing.

In all diseases of the nasal mucous membrane the remedy used must be non-irritating. The medical profession has been slow to learn this. Nothing satisfactory can be accomplished with douches, snuffs, powders or syringes because they are all irritating—do not thoroughly reach the affected surfaces, and should be abandoned as worse than failures. A multitude of persons who had for years borne all the worry and pain that catarrh can inflict testify to radical cures wrought by Ely's Cream Balm.

Children Cry for it.

If a child will take a medicine with pleasure, you may know that it is not in any way offensive to the taste. Children like HAMBURG FIGS, and it is no longer necessary to disgust them with castor oil. 25c. Dose, one fig. Mack Drug Co., N. Y. For sale by J. G. Miller.

Rheumatism,

BEING due to the presence of uric acid in the blood, is most effectually cured by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Be sure you get Ayer's and no other, and take it till the poisonous acid is thoroughly expelled from the system. We challenge attention to this testimony:—

"About two years ago, after suffering for nearly two years from rheumatic gout, being able to walk only with great discomfort, and having tried various remedies, including mineral waters, without relief, I saw by an advertisement in a Chicago paper that a man had been relieved of this distressing complaint, after long suffering, by taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I then decided to make a trial of this medicine, and took it regularly for eight months, and am pleased to state that it has effected a complete cure. I have since had no return of the disease."—Mrs. R. Irving Dodge, 110 West 125th st., New York.

"One year ago I was taken ill with inflammatory rheumatism, being confined to my house six months. I came out of the sickness very much debilitated, with no appetite, and my system disordered in every way. I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla and began to improve at once, gaining in strength and soon recovering my usual health. I cannot say too much in praise of this well-known medicine."—Mrs. L. A. THE GIRLS OF CUBA.

They Understand the Art of Flirting and Keeping Comfortable.

The Streets in Havana Built with an Eye to the Shade—The Windows Barred to Prevent Romeo and Juliet Interviews—Hot Weather Costumes.

Life in Cuba, whether in January or July is an unending struggle to maintain an agreeable temperature. The Cubans achieve this important result by never exposing themselves to the sun, sitting indoors or in shaded plazas, riding in covered victorias, providing themselves with large parasols, placing awnings over the sidewalks and even stretching canvas across the narrow streets. Curiously enough [illegible] produce coolness, as Cuba enjoys constant winds, blowing softly but steadily, by which the people are fanned and cooled. In direct conflict with the sun's rays, these breezes amount to nothing. It is the shade which makes them so cooling, that stepping out in the sunshine in Havana is like going from a New York sidewalk into a [illegible] body walks in the daytime. [illegible] victorias are so numerous that there always seems to be a [illegible] in front of every fourth or fifth [illegible]. The ever sleeping drivers [illegible] aroused with blows and [illegible] their whips when one desires to use a [illegible] for shopping, sight-seeing, making calls or even going from a hotel to a [illegible] only two blocks distant.

During my year's residence in Cuba I have been astonished at the number and variety of cooling drinks in ordinary use. On entering a cafe a Cuban will ordinarily order a glass of cocoanut milk, or a glass of cocoa and gin, or iced water, or panales and water, which is merely the white of an egg and sugar made into a cake of flaky [illegible] and dissolved in a glass of water. The number of drinks made from water having the sting taken out of it with wine, alcohol, fruit or sugar is surprisingly great, and the amount of good they do in cooling humanity is immense.

Old Sol prescribes the style of architecture as well as the mode of life to such an extent, that were the Cubans not Christians, they would doubtless be sun worshippers. Cupid, too, takes a hand in this important matter. Every afternoon a Cuban town resolves itself into a beauty show. As soon as the sun's rays slant enough to throw the streets into shade, the girls, wearing their lightest costumes, lounge in picturesque attitudes in the windows to enjoy the street scenes and the admiration of the passers-by. These windows are Cupid's own. They are as large as double doors while the cool marble sills, composed of China tiles, are as wide as ordinary sofas, and a foot or two above the sidewalk. Here the large-eyed, languid beauties repose at half length, resting their bodies in the window frames, [illegible]

[illegible] whispering to her the same time, while she joins in the conversation of her relations with an air of [illegible] interest that an actress might envy. One never sees a woman reading in Cuba, and for that matter [illegible] weakens their eyes by such amusement. Every club has its library, but the collection of books is [illegible] and the windows are dusty and [illegible] looking. [illegible]

scenery. The flirting girl notices how her fan allows the young man to see the mischievous expression, and then hides her face in confusion. Imagine a roguish laughing glance at the top or side of a fan quickly replaced by the view of a demure round face, with its coal black eyes and ruby lips, turned calmly in another direction, and wearing the expression of a statue. There is probably more flirting in Cuba than in any other place, but this is doubtless to be attributed to the fashion the women have of lolling in the windows, which is taken advantage of by the young men, and has led to a curious custom.

If a youth is smitten by a maiden's charms, and does not know her name, or how to become acquainted with her, he walks by her window of an afternoon, passing and repassing and directing [illegible] glances at the object of his admiration. She is quick to notice this, and if inclined to encourage him, she remains in her seat. In time, he may venture to speak to her, and may secure an invitation to call upon the family, after a few whispered chats at the window, or will have a way pointed out to him for a formal introduction. But if his attentions and looks are distasteful and offensive to the young woman, she waits till she is certain that he sees her, and then quits the window with a show of great displeasure, flouncing into the room and banging the window shutters behind her. Cuban girls may not go into the street on shopping excursions, to market or for any other purpose unless they are attended by a servant or an elderly person.

Thus does the Cuban belle, from whom the flirtatious American girl may learn so much in her favorite art, pass by many but easy gradations up Cupid's stairway. The heated term is gliding swiftly away and with the advent of September, the absent belles are returning to the city with an infinite satisfaction and self-complacency of manner that savours of a falling [illegible]. May they [illegible] in the reflection that the past is secure, and quaff the cup of assured expectation until the flowers fade, till winter, or perhaps till Easter, when they may finally scale the heights of happiness by the ladder of love.

GEORGE F. CLARKE.

FURNITURE FOR SUMMER.

How The Country House Should Be Furnished This Year.

Mahogany Taking the Place of the Light Woods—To Fit Up a Chintz Bedroom. Last Century Fashions Revived in Woodwork.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

As the gowns of our grandmothers are this Summer the styles, so also for the country house are the furniture and the hangings. Indeed one is necessary to the other.

The gay soft sweeping gowns of India silk girdled close beneath the arms, the scant skirts falling straight and open, the tiny bodices laced up the back, the puffed sleeves that extend only half way from shoulder to elbow, the kerchiefs and the snowy [illegible]

That mahogany is fast regaining its old importance goes almost without saying. There is springing up, even among people of moderate means, some notion of founding families, and the idea of permanence implied [illegible] country house almost equally important with the place in town, the accumulation of belongings not to be bundled about at May movings in a [illegible] solid mahogany rubbed till it shines like polished glass.

With mahogany goes chintz and the two make a favorite country combination. Hardly a pretentious new house at Tuxedo or Lenox which has not its chintz bedroom. Old-fashioned chintz, you may believe, in designs that were called the new India printings a hundred years ago. Reds and creams and soft blues and yellows abound in the coverings, adapted especially to the hard dark wood furniture and trim. To correspond with the chintz hangings come the new chintz wall papers, reproducing the same cream grounds and the same patterns, but outlined in [illegible] instead of filled in.

I have seen a charming chintz bedroom in the Summer cottage of an artist on Long Island, on which comparatively little money was expended, but which admirably illustrates the idea; the floor stained a very dark red, rubbed with shellac varnish and made soft to the feet by the addition of a few good rugs and a strip of [illegible] carpet, which is the owner's special pride, the woodwork mahogany, with deep paneled window seats and a high mantel, tiled with brown red tiles with golden lights in them; the bed a [illegible] mahogany four poster, with brass tester rails and curtains of [illegible] chintz, the ground of which is a pale, delicate green, with birds of brown figured with golden red sprays and the deep red [illegible] flowers. [illegible] cheap [illegible] brought at the [illegible] country store has been turned into the most tasteful of toilet tables by the use of cretonne covered with dotted Swiss. The walls are covered with a creamy paper in a Louis Seize design of narrow pinkish stripes, [illegible] corresponding to the cretonne, alternating with bouquets tied with fluttering ribbons. The ceiling is very delicately stenciled round with flowers. With cretonne hangings and a half dozen little pictures such as one gets with the art magazines, framed some in white and some in pink lacquered frames, the room comes as near the midsummer ideal as one often approaches where narrow limits are set to ways and means.

Mahogany inlaid with mother of pearl in eighteenth century fashion designs and white mahogany finished with gold rosettes and scroll work, with brass handles and inlaid with dark mahogany, are fashionable compromises between light wood and dark, for the country house. Cherry, not stained to imitate mahogany, but left of its natural salmon hue, quartered oak and even the old fashioned black walnut which is trying to engineer a boom on its own account are largely used in the new warm weather furniture. A country house not far from Nyack has been rented for a season or two to an outing club of a novel description. Eight or ten interesting women, all of artistic temperament, occupy it. They vie with one another, the clever creatures, in odd rustic decorations for their individual apartments, but the pride of all centers in the reception parlor which is a joint possession. This room has lounge and armchairs upholstered in the native grass linen that comes from the West Indies. It is striped in delicate shades of blue, brown and ecru and makes a tasteful but not expensive material. There are hangings of the grass linen at door and windows and white sash curtains upon the glass. The floor is covered with a blue and brown matting and the walls are covered with more grass linen in narrow stripes of pale blue, silver and gray. The deep frieze is a pale blue stencilled with silver and the furniture is holly carved and inlaid with silver. Table spreads, rugs and scarfs introduce Japanese [illegible] and chintzes over which are scattered sprays of tiny flowers in pale blue, red and olive green leaves.

I have pleasant recollections of a country house at Shelter Island, whose immense hall occupies half the ground floor and is living room and reception hall in one. The hall, which has just been redecorated for the season's occupancy, is finished in oak—heavy oak staircase, oak mantel and huge oak settees drawn up on a chilly evening about the log fire. The floor is polished oak and the walls are tinted a kind of wood brown with stray golden tones. The picture rail is oak again and the frieze a brownish ecru figured with blue. The ceiling is blue and a brassy brown and the ceiling a pale blue, with enough yellow introduced to keep its temper with other tones. The rugs repeat the wood brown, the gold and blue; the window hangings are in two shades of pale and dark old blue Persian stuff, and the portieres and hangings add a little dull red to the other colors. The walls are nearly covered with etchings in oak frames, the only space alongside the stairs having scarce a monotonous foot to weary the eye. With the rain dashing against the windows outside this hall does not meet you with a pursed up lip and hands behind its back, as if to say "What's your business here," but opens its doors to the entire household with generous hospitality.

It is hardly possible to say too much for the pretty and artistic cretonnes which go so well with the rattan furniture so deservedly popular for moderate priced Summer rooms. In this branch of manufacture the New England mills are giving us something more characteristic than can be offered by foreign makers, introducing in their designs the American wild flowers. In blue and white cretonnes there are blue bell designs; in pink and white, arbutus and mountain laurel and wild roses; in yellows, sun flower and goldenrod patterns. The Louis Seize designs are liked in all the light, cheerful, delicate tintings, and are shown in narrow stripes mostly. Like these in coloring are the Pompadour cretonnes with small bouquets on pale cream grounds. Japanese cretonnes go well with the Summer hangings of bamboo and beads, not those you see in the shops, but newer ones made from bamboo cut in short lengths and strung on cords with large green beads between, each strand ending in a tiny musical bell. Italian renaissance cretonnes are appropriate in bedrooms furnished with the pretty and graceful sets in maple and bamboo. A chamber in an out of town house is being fitted up with this material. The walls are papered in low soft colors, the design showing baskets of fruits, birds and small leaves, patterns seldom introduced nowadays but occasionally appropriate. Across a corner between two windows stands a Duchesse table draped with cretonne of the same pattern as wall paper. The bed is bamboo and maple with cretonne spread and the floor is covered with a white matting. There is a portiere of cream linen mosaic cloth embroidered in the cretonne colors and white dimity window curtains. Dimity, by the way, is being fashionably revived.

There is nothing more attractive among the new Summer curtain fabrics than the Liberty cottons, which show old-fashioned India designs in soft blues and Vandyke reds and serve on creamy grounds. A country parlor has walls in gold leaf on an ecru ground. The carpet is a soft blue green with invisible figures. The hangings are of Liberty cotton blending into the [illegible] greenish blue. Under the windows is a divan where one might dream away an entire July afternoon, an ideal nook when the sun has made the [illegible] drowsy outside.

No Summer hangings show violently contrasted designs, both wall paper and chintzes paying more heed to color than to patterns. No Summer furniture displays much carving. Simple patterns and well made pieces from fine wood are the rule.

THE BABOON WON.

How a Little Monkey Took the Conceit Out of a Prize-Fighter.

In the old St. Louis museum we had, among other attractions, a baboon called Dick, says a writer in the New York Sun. He was a solid chunk of a fellow, good-tempered and a great favorite. He had one peculiarity, though, which we had to cater to. He took short naps twice a day, and if aroused before his time he was as ugly as sin all the rest of the day. We had him dressed up as a little boy, and when the time came to take his nap he crept into an old-fashioned cradle and the fat woman generally rocked him to sleep. That very thing was quite a draw, and plenty of people came in solely to see the baboon rocked off to slumber.

One day, soon after Dick had closed his eyes, a half-drunken chap entered the place and created considerable disturbance. He went by the name of Awful Pete and was a hard slugger. I tried to reason with him and get him out, but he unfortunately caught sight of the sleeping baboon and at once demanded that the animal be aroused and put through his tricks. I sought to explain, but he wouldn't have it, saying:

"I paid to see the fish, and I'm going to see him or bust the b'iler!"

"But if you wake him he'll fight."

"Then I'll wring his neck!"

Before I could stop him he dodged under the rope and lifted Dick out of the cradle. The animal woke up and took in the situation in about the tenth part of a second, and then he fastened his hands into Pete's hair, got a grip with his teeth on the slugger's nose, and we had a museum, menagerie and circus combined for the next five minutes. Pete roared and whooped and groaned around in pain and terror, and the baboon pulled handfuls of hair from his head, and bit and scratched like a wildcat. When we finally got him off that slugger was a sight to behold, and had to be taken to the hospital at once. Two hours after he had had his wounds dressed I went to see him, and as soon as I spoke to him he began crying and asked:

"Was it a baboon which did that?"

"Yes."

"Big as a lion?"

"Oh, no. He weighs about twenty-six pounds. Why do you weep?"

"Hadn't I orter weep?" he savagely demanded, as the tears came afresh. "I've had thirteen fights and knocked my man out every time, and now to be downed by a whiskerless monkey in one round has broke me all up."

SMALL BUT WICKED.

How a Little Wretch of a Boy Broke His Sister's Heart.

The complacence or the scorn with which the masculine mind regards the female of the race begins so early in life, says the Boston Courier, that it is most difficult to say whether it is the result of tuition or is one of the gifts of intuition. The small boy feels himself superior to his little sister quite without regard to whether he or she is the more clever. He is he and she is only she.

A small five-year-old lad, in whom this sense of masculine superiority was not wholly lacking, was one day arrayed in his first trousers. Standing before his sister, a couple of years younger, he drew himself up for her inspection and then proceeded to address her to this effect:

"Kittie," he said, "you can't never wear trousers."

He paused, apparently to let his words take their full effect.

He paused again and let this dreadful announcement in its turn sink into his sister's soul; then he brought out the climax with a triumphant thrill in his voice more eloquent than any words could have been.

"Kittie, you can't never be a man never!"

Poor, small Kittie, overwhelmed by these successive statements, of which she comprehended the import only as something unspeakably dreadful, and took that from the tone, probably, rather than from the words, looked at her brother one agonized moment, and then gave vent to her anguish in one wild howl, which brought nurses from one direction and mamma from another. At sight of the audience Kittie burst into tears and lamentations piteous to behold, and when the small boy was reproved for making his sister cry his answer was:

"Well, I just told her she'd always got to be a girl, 'cause I thought she'd be disappointed if she got to be five and couldn't have on trousers."

There seemed to be nothing in particular which could be said to this, and the elders devoted themselves to assuaging the grief of the small girl as well as they might, leaving the boy to strut about in his new trousers in the full consciousness of having done his duty to the weaker vessel.

ANECDOTE OF DR. RUSH.

The Power with Which Memory Asserts Itself in Our Sleep.

Dr. Rush was, perhaps, one of the most untiring students that ever lived, says the New York Ledger. Two young physicians were conversing in his presence once, and one of them said: "When I finished my studies—" "When you finished your studies!" said the doctor, abruptly; "why, you must be a happy man to have finished so young; I do not expect to finish mine while I live."

The writer once asked him how he had been able to collect such an immense amount of information and facts as his publications and lectures contained. "I have been enabled to do it," he replied, "by economizing my time as Mr. Wesley did. I have not spent one hour in amusement in thirty years." And taking a small note-book from his pocket, and showing it to me, he said: "I fill such a book as this once a week with observations and thoughts which occur to me, and facts collected in the rooms of my patients, and these are all preserved and used."

I once heard the doctor relate the following dream, to show that the memory sometimes exerts itself more powerfully in our sleeping than in our waking hours in calling up things that have been forgotten: A gentleman in Jersey, of large property, had provided in his will that his wife, in connection with a neighbor, should settle his estate. After his death, in fulfilling the intentions of his will, a certain important paper, which could not be dispensed with, was missing. Repeated and diligent search was made for it, but in vain. The widow at length dreamed that the said paper was in the bottom of a barrel in the garret, covered with a number of books. The dream made so strong an impression on her mind that she was induced to make an examination, and there, to her astonishment, she found the paper. The doctor's explanation was that no supernatural agency had been employed, but that during the abstraction of all external objects and impressions from the senses in the sleeping state, the memory exerted itself with an intenseness that it could not do in the waking state. He supposed that her husband had informed her at some time of the situation of this paper, and that the fact had become dormant in her memory until the dream called it up.

A GAME OF CHESS.

The Young Man Who Beat Suleimann Half a Century Ago.

How Egypt's Most Famous Warrior and Champion Chess Player Made the Acquaintance of the Great Strategist of the North.

On a summer afternoon, almost fifty years ago, Suleimann Pasha, commander-in-chief of the Egyptian artillery, sat at coffee in a cafe on the Nile terrace in Cairo, says the New York Sun. At tables near him were many soldiers who had helped him fight the armies of Sultan Mahmud not many months before. Several of them had been with him in the battle of Nisib, when he routed the Turkish armies under Hafis Pasha and Colonel von Moltke, then in the Sultan's service. But Suleimann Pasha was not thinking of the soldiers about him, nor of Hafis Pasha, nor Colonel von Moltke, nor the great battle of Nisib. His whole attention was concentrated on the chessboard before him.

Suleimann Pasha was a famous chess player. In the first few weeks after his return to Cairo he had beaten dozens of times Ulema Reschid Aga, formerly the champion chess player of Northern Egypt. He regarded his reputation as a chess player as somewhat akin to his reputation as a warrior. He considered chess to be preeminently a soldier's game, and never tired of making elaborate comparisons between strategy on the chess board and strategy on the field of battle. Every afternoon he met Ulema Reschid Aga at the cafe on the Nile terrace and beat him two or three games.

On this particular afternoon almost fifty years ago Ulema Reschid Aga was a little late in coming to his vis-a-vis, and Suleimann Pasha was having a preliminary skirmish with himself while awaiting his opponent's arrival. His diversion was interrupted by the appearance on the terrace of a long, gaunt, bony young stranger. The stranger strode right up to the Pasha's table, and, after making a half-military salute, said so loudly that every one in the terrace could hear:

"Pasha, I challenge you to a game of chess."

All the officers on the terrace sat quite still and stared at the thin, pale young man who stood before their great commander. The Pasha looked him over curiously.

"I am at your service," was his answer, after a long pause. "How high do you usually play?"

"Sometimes for nothing, sometimes for a great deal. You fix the stakes, Pasha."

The stranger nodded and sat down. The lots were cast. The game was begun. All the officers in the cafe left their coffee to crowd around the players. The first few moves convinced them that the long, bony fingers of the stranger had moved chess-men many times before. At the end of twenty minutes the Pasha's eyes suddenly brightened and he smiled. He had an invincible combination. He placed his queen before his opponent's queen. The officers began to grumble, for they thought their commander had lost his head. Only Reschid Aga, who in the meantime had joined the crowd of spectators, looked happy. He had guessed his friend's combination, and he, too, was sure that it was invincible.

"He will take the queen," commented the spectators, anxiously.

"Then he will be checkmated in eight moves," whispered back Reschid Aga.

"And if he doesn't take her?"

"He will lose his own," said the ex-champion, triumphantly.

The stranger moved a pawn. Suleimann lost his queen. The officers thought it was all up with the smart young man and started back to their coffee. They were called back, however, by the first words the Pasha's opponent had spoken since he sat down to the table.

"Pasha, in twelve moves you will be checkmated."

The interest of the Pasha's friends became intense. They counted each move aloud. One—two—three—four—and the Pasha was already hard pushed. Five—six—seven—eight—nine—and his men were hemmed in on all sides. Ten—the Pasha tried in vain to break the blockade by sacrificing his queen. Eleven—and he drew back his king into a corner. Twelve—and the stranger cried out: "Checkmate."

There was a dead silence and all stared at the Pasha. He thought hard for several minutes without uttering a word. Then he looked searchingly into the stranger's face and said:

"Once before I have seen chess played as you play it. Your strategy is not new to me, although I was not [illegible]

[illegible]

"Young man, you remind me of that great chess player from the North who all but routed us at Nisib, as you have routed me here. Young man, only one man in the world can play chess like that, [illegible] Colonel von Moltke."

"You have it," answered the stranger, [illegible] the Pasha his hand. "I am Moltke."

The Man Who Never Makes Mistakes.

I don't want anything to do with the man who never makes mistakes. None of that kind for me! You can bet your life he's a stick-in-the-mud! Why, he can't be otherwise! The man with originality and push must all the time be poking his nose into unexplored country. He's a Stanley, and he must expect to have Stanley-luck part of the time. But the Stanleys are the locomotives that drag the world's train along in spite of the [illegible].

DISPENSARY HUMOR.

Even So Gruesome a Place as a Hospital Has Its Funny Side.

A woman who was being treated for a stomach difficulty at the North end dispensary, writes Alice Bates from Boston, found in the ash barrel of the dump a bottle containing some gruesome black mixture, and the next time she presented herself for examination she brought it with her.

"Doctor," she said, "will yer plase to taste o' that? I thought to take a little last night; ye wouldn't believe the power o' distress I was in the whole blessed time."

"Distress!" the doctor exclaimed in vexation; "I'm glad of it. Didn't I tell you that if you kept taking things I wouldn't have any thing more to do with you?"

"Yes, I know, doctor, an' I ax yer pardon. But I couldn't bear to waste it, for fear it might be just the very medicine I'd need."

And when she went away she asked for the bottle, as she had a sister who was not well and she thought it might help her.

On another occasion I happened to be in the room of the dentist of the dispensary when there came in an elderly Irishwoman with her daughter, a strapping woman of two or three and twenty. The mother was urging the daughter to have a tooth extracted, and it became apparent from the conversation that they had been there the day before, but that the daughter's courage had not been brought up to the sticking point. This time, however, the woman was persuaded to get into the chair and to allow the dentist to examine her teeth; but upon the inquiry which was the offending tooth, the interesting fact was developed that there were none of the young woman's teeth particularly out of order, but that it being a superstition to which she and her mother religiously held that whenever a woman bore a child she must lose a tooth, they had thought it best to have one taken out before it became painful.

"Which one would you like me to take out?" inquired the dentist, much diverted.

"O, shure an' it's yerself 'll be after knowin' which one it'll be will be comin'," was the reply. "It's her first child, an' he's the finest boy ever you laid eyes on." From which it will be evident that even so gruesome a place as a dispensary has its humors.

How to Collect Debts.

The Rev. Dr. Sutton once said to the late Mr. Peech, a veterinary surgeon, "Mr. Peech, how is it that you have not called upon me for your account?"

"Oh," said Mr. Peech, "I never ask a gentleman for money."

"Indeed," said the Vicar, "then how do you get on if he doesn't pay?"

"Why," replied Mr. Peech, "after a certain time I conclude that he is not a gentleman, and then I ask him."

No Time to Dawdle.

She—"I said you mustn't stay so late, dear." He—"Do you think he meant it?" She—"Yes. He always puts on his slippers when he comes home, but he didn't do so to-night."

LOVE'S TRIUMPH.

Being a New Ending to a Summer Flirtation.

He met her at the mountains,
A maiden young and fair,
And, forming her acquaintance,
He flirted with her there.

They roamed the hills together,
They wandered through the vale,
And there to her he whispered
Love's sweet and tender tale.

The maiden did not chide him,
She did not say him nay,
But said she'd give an answer
To him some future day.

He met her in the city,
This maiden young and fair;
Did she receive his greeting
With cold and haughty stare?

Did she attempt to pass him,
His outstretched hand ignore,
And say, I do not think, sir,
We ever met before?

Oh, no, she smiled upon him,
Her hand she let him press,
Responded to his greeting
With words of friendliness.

The maiden knew he loved her,
And love the youth did she;
The sales-girl and the barber
Will shortly wedded be.

IN DEATH'S PRESENCE

Sensations of a Man Who Knows His Fate Is Sealed.

A Government Scout Describes His Feelings While Being Used for a Target by a Guerrilla and While Waiting to Be Hanged.

In the summer of 1864, when the rebel guerrilla Joe Shelby and his band were the terror of Southern Missouri, I was captured by a detachment of them while acting as regimental mail carrier. At a lonely spot on the highway, between the Union videttes and the camp, three men suddenly sprang out of the woods at me. The hour was four o'clock in the afternoon, and as I was within the Union lines I was unsuspicious of danger. Just a minute before the men betrayed themselves a rabbit had crossed the highway ahead of me, and I had drawn my revolver, hoping for a shot. I therefore had it in my hand when the trio made the rush. One sprang for my horse's head and the other two closed in broadside. I fired and killed the first man dead in his tracks. As I wheeled to fire on my right my horse made a spring and my bullet struck the man in the left shoulder. Before I could make another move the third man pulled me from my horse. We were only half a mile from the Union camp, and they did not do any shooting for fear of creating an alarm. As I was pulled to the ground the fellow struck me on the head with the butt of a revolver, and for the next five minutes I was unconscious. When I came to I had been dragged off the road into the bushes, as had the dead body of the guerrilla, and my horse was standing near by. The one whom I had wounded had his knife in his hand and wanted to finish me, but the other protested and held him off. I was finally ordered to mount, my feet made fast under the saddle, and after going through the woods about thirty rods we came to the spot where the guerrillas had left their horses. They mounted, struck into a bridle path, and after going about three miles we came upon the guerrilla camp. There were from eighty-five to a hundred men, and things looked as if they had been there several days. They were a tough-looking lot of men, dressed in all sorts of clothes and armed with all sorts of weapons, and I gave up all hope as soon as I set eyes on them. The rebel guerrillas of Virginia occasionally spared a prisoner, but the Western guerrillas had no pity.

As soon as it was known that I had killed one man and wounded another they were for killing me at once. A dozen ways of doing it were suggested, but it was now growing dark, there was a large mail to be opened and read, and "Cap'n Bill" ordered that I should be tied to a tree and guarded through the night, and added that my case would be disposed of before they moved in the morning. I was lashed to a tree in a sitting position, a guard took a seat on a stump near by, and thus began the night. The guerrillas cooked and ate supper, but refused me both food and drink. When I protested at this treatment the guard was ordered to blow my head off if I didn't shut up.

The man sentenced to be hanged doubtless hopes for a reprieve until the noose is placed over his neck. While I was satisfied that my hours were numbered, I had nothing to hope for. It was an extra mail I was riding with, and my failure to appear would not be noticed. The reports of my revolver could not have been heard by any of my friends, nor was the presence of the guerrillas, so far as I knew, even suspected. I turned the matter over and over in my mind, and I could not satisfy myself that I had one chance in a hundred. How would they kill me? I had seen a dozen victims of guerrilla vengeance, and they had either been knifed or the muzzle of a revolver held close to the ear to deaden the report. In either case the suffering was of brief duration. After I had figured it out that I was to die I felt relieved. Indeed, there was a feeling of elation about it. I was young and robust and life was sweet, but I did not cling to it as you might expect. The thought of begging them to spare me never occurred. Could I have got loose and armed myself I should have fought the whole crowd instead of running away.

Soon after midnight I fell asleep, and that with considerable noise going on around me. It was daylight when I awoke, and the men were turning out. They cooked and ate breakfast, offering me no part, and I knew that every minute brought me nearer death. I was not nervous, but I was curious to know what method they might adopt. After breakfast had been disposed of the men gathered about me, and "Cap'n Bill" said to the man whom I had wounded in the shoulder:

"He's your meat, in course, but the boys want to see some fun out of it. You kin crack at him off hand."

The man had his left arm in a sling. He drew a heavy revolver and walked off a distance of fifteen paces, and then turned and leveled on me. I shut my eyes and counted. I had got to "seven" when the report came. The bullet hit the tree, six inches above my head, and to the right, and there was a general laugh. He raised his arm again, and this time I had counted only "six" when the report came. He made a line shot, but was seven or eight inches too high. The pain of his wound had unnerved him. The men laughed and jeered, but he shut his teeth hard, raised his arm slowly, and now I felt that all was over. I felt the wind of his bullet and then heard the report. The ball passed my right ear by no more than half an inch.

"That's bully!" shouted half a dozen men in chorus. "One more shot and you'll hit the bull's-eye!"

He was just lifting his arm when a musket cracked, followed by a volley, and half a dozen men fell dead around me. No resistance was made by the guerrillas, and out of the band not over fifteen escaped. My capture had been witnessed by two of our men who had been out foraging, and the guerrilla camp had been located soon after daylight. About three hundred of our infantry were quietly brought up through the woods, and when in position opened fire, and it was just in time to save me. When our troops poured into camp they found about twenty wounded men. It was an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth in the West. When we rode away we left none but dead men, and not one of them got burial.

The reader may urge that one's feelings under the above circumstances would not compare with those of a man awaiting death by hanging. Well, I have also undergone that trial and endured the sensations, and can speak by the card. After the close of the war I went West and was employed as a Government scout, but being wounded by an Indian arrow in the spring of 1867 I got a three months' leave of absence and went down on the Texas coast to recruit. I had been at Indianola about four weeks, boarding at a private house, when I took a small sailboat one day and went off up the inner bay on a fishing trip. At noon I ran into the mouth of a creek, where a cabin was in view, calculating on getting some matches to replace my stock. The cabin was about fifty feet from the water's edge, and after a "halloo!" which was not answered, I landed and walked up to the house. The door stood wide open, and on the floor lay a man, cold and dead, having been shot in the breast. After a moment I entered for a closer inspection, and I felt of the body and found it cold. Death had occurred several hours previously. The cabin was a wretched structure, poorly furnished, and it did not seem as if the motive would have been rob-

I had returned to the door, intending to hasten to Indianola and give the alarm, when a fishboat, carrying four men, landed in the creek. I ran down and related the news, and all of them returned to the house with me. The men satisfied themselves that the body was cold, but presently drew apart and began to consult together, and after four or five minutes their leader said to me:

"My mates are agreed that this don't look right, stranger."

"How do you mean?"

"Wy, thar's bin a murder here."

"So there has, but you don't connect me with it, do you?"

"Well, we found you here alone."

"But I had only just arrived. Suppose I had found you here. That body, as you see, is stone cold, showing that death took place hours ago, while I left town only at seven o'clock this morning. He was dead then or soon after."

They consulted again and then he said:

"You may be all right, but you'll have to prove it. We shall take you to town."

I expressed my willingness to go, and asked them to particularly remember the state of the body, and to examine my revolver and note its condition. I hadn't the least idea that I had got myself into trouble, but I soon discovered to the contrary. I was given in charge of an officer at Indianola, and a party went up to view the body. There had been a murder. Somebody was guilty. I was found there and alone. If I wasn't guilty then I must prove myself innocent. That was the way of the West then. There was but one lawyer in the town and he a poor one, but I secured his services. I was confined in an old building used as a guard house during the war, and, as soon as the party returned and reported that no trace of the murderer could be found, public sentiment was against me. A warrant was issued by the local justice, and next day I was brought up for examination. There wasn't the slightest proof to hold me on, but the squire, who knew nothing whatever of law, and was hardly intelligent in the ordinary sense, ordered me held for further investigation. Small squads of men were sent out to beat up for the murderer, but at noon on the third day all had come in except one, and had met with no success. I sat looking out of a wooden-barred window facing the street, when I saw five or six men stop opposite, and begin to argue and discuss. They were talking, when my lawyer entered, and coolly observed:

"Well, they haven't found any body else, and the boys say they are going to hang you!"

"But you know I am innocent."

"Of course I do, but they don't believe it."

"And they will hang an innocent man because they can't find the guilty one!"

"That's about the size of it. I'll go out and have another talk, however. You know we don't go much on either law or gospel around here since the war."

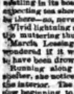
He went out, but presently returned and said:

"The boys is bound to do it, and you had best get ready. They will give you an hour."

I felt it was useless to further argue the matter, and I wrote out a statement and a couple of letters, gave my guard directions about certain matters, and was then as ready as I could be. Was I nervous? Not a bit. While I was certain that I should be hanged, I did not feel like bemoaning my fate. If I had been armed I would have made a fight for revenge, but, as I was defenseless, I simply waited for the crowd to come. I wondered how they would hang me, and when I reflected that they had no gallows and that I should be strangled, I had something like vertigo for a few minutes. It had just passed away when five or six of the crowd came in. I was led out, conducted about a quarter of a mile to a tree, and after I had had my arms and legs tied I was lifted to the head of a whisky barrel and the noose of the rope dropped over my head. They were very cool about it, and I heard some of them saying that I evidently meant to die game. When all was ready I was asked if I had any thing to say. I replied that I had, and for about ten minutes I gave it to them the best I knew how, and by no means neglected the justice, who stood close by. I was astonished at my own nerve and coolness. I hadn't quite wound up yet when some one discovered that the last party out was approaching. One of the men was waving a handkerchief, and when I saw it I knew that some discovery had been made.

I stood with the noose about my neck for seven or eight minutes longer, but as soon as the men came up there was a sudden change of base. They had got on the track of the murderer, hunted him for several hours, and had finally shot him down and had his body in the boat. I was, of course, released, and every one sought to apologize for his actions, and it was only when the whole affair was over that I shivered at my near approach to death.—N. Y. Sun.

A TERRIBLE MISTAKE.



"'Tis as well," she said, with a quiver of pain round the firm mouth, "if I perish. I am here in a lonely, unfrequented place; but I don't mind; no one will know that I started for Aunt Meg's on Clyde island, with my heart full of hate, and lost my way."

The wind, which had driven her little craft hither in spite of all efforts to prevent it, was blowing a gale.

The boat grated on the sands and, springing out, Marcia pulled it high up on the whitened beach.

Over there lay the city with her home nestling in its bosom, and Harley would be expecting tea shortly now, but she wouldn't be there—no, never again.

Vivid lightning streaked the horizon and the muttering thunder was coming nearer. Marcia Lessinge shivered and vaguely wondered if it would not have been better to have been drowned outright than this.

Running along the sands looking for shelter, she noticed a dim path leading into the interior. The great drops of rain were slow beginning to fall, and, concluding to trust to its guidance, she turned into the diminutive road and disappeared among the [illegible] lining the shore.

[illegible] the storm burst over the city in all its fury, and luckless humanity rushed indoors.

In a respectable-looking flat the smoldering fire on the hearth and a frugal meal long since prepared, fast growing cold. In the hall a young mechanic hung up his damp coat, brushed his shoes and wondered why no sound came from the adjoining room.

"Marcia must be out," he thought; "but it's an awful night to get belated, though I reckon she's to mother's." He went in and sat down by the fire; the tempest beat heavily at window and door, and he went over to the drenched panes uneasily.

Some one enveloped in a gossamer was at the outside door, and the young husband hastened.

"Isn't Marcia here yet?" It was his wife's brother who questioned thus fearfully as soon as the door admitted him.

"Not just now," answered the husband, "but tea is prepared and waiting, so I thought she had run over to your place for a moment and got storm-bound."

"O! Harley; she is lost on the water, I fear."

Harley Lessinge sprang to his feet, a terrible fear pressing like a weight on his heart. "What do you mean, Theodore?"

"O! Hal, I mean that Marcia was seen out on the water in an open boat just before the storm and alone. She can't keep above the waves in such a storm as this."

"Out on the water!" and Lessinge stood dumb with terrified amazement gazing at the boy, who wrung his hand in helpless grief. "What was she out there for, Theo?" he gasped, finally. Then he sank into a seat moaning: "She has been strange of late; but as she said nothing, I know nothing—I don't know what to do—poor Marcia!"

Theodore Raynor stood regarding his brother-in-law suspiciously. It was plain that he doubted him. "I'll tell you if you don't know." Lessinge looked up eagerly, and the boy continued:

"She has seen you several times at 122 West Fourth street; has seen you caress a lovely woman there and kiss the child in her arms when you bade them good-bye. This may be the key to the strangeness. For my part I think Marcia meant to never return."

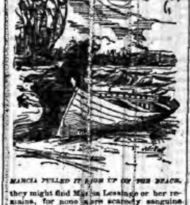
"O! my God!" cried the husband, breaking away from the lad and rushing wildly out into the street. "I am perfectly innocent of it all; [illegible] O! I must find Marcia; must go to my wife."

"You can not now," called the brother after him. "She may have reached Aunt Meg's at Clyde—may have gotten there—but I can't see how, either."

But Harley Lessinge sped away in the pouring rain, intent on finding his little girl-wife. Theo followed him, fearing for his reason; there was such a wild look in his eyes as he went out. He wished he had not revealed Marcia's secret; more evil might come of the telling than good; but, after all, how did he know just what to say?

He found Harley some blocks away wandering aimlessly about, dazed and drenched to the skin. He took him home and sent for a physician.

Meantime the storm had abated and parties were out along the shore, if haply they might find Marcia Lessinge or her remains, for none were scarcely sanguine enough to expect a safe return.



MARCIA PULLED IT HIGH UP ON THE BEACH.

Marcia sped along the path in the rushing rain; it was growing dark very fast now. "I may survive this night," she muttered, "and reach Clyde to-morrow, if I find shelter."

"But she was beautiful," catching her breath in whispers, with little, painful gasps, "the woman whom he caressed, and I know that he loves her!"

Not heeding her steps, she caught her foot in a tangle of vines and fell; struggling to her feet she pressed on toward the terminus of the dim woodland path.

"It certainly leads somewhere," trying to see through the stormy twilight. A faint glimmer of light rewarded her aching vision.

A few rods farther and she came to a small cottage. "I did not know that this bit of land was really inhabited," she said, much relieved; "but it is somebody's home."

"May I come in?" she asked, faintly, rapping at the door.

An old lady answered the summons. "Gracious me! Why, come right in."

In a trice Marcia Lessinge found light and warmth in the plainly furnished, but pleasant interior. A bright fire burning on the hearth reflected its cosy gleams on a few old-fashioned portraits on the smoky walls, and the neat and tidy appearance of the room was altogether home-like and restful.

After a change of clothing and a cup of fragrant tea, the cheery old woman asked: "You lost your way, did you?"

"Yes," answered Marcia, "my boat is ashore near by."

"It's awful to be out in such a storm as this, 'specially on the water. You were going to the city, I suppose?"

"No," said Marcia, "coming from. I was going to Murray on Clyde."

"O, yes; that is a little farther north," rejoined the hostess. "My husband is over there for to-day; would have been back to-night but for the storm.

"I've a son in the city," she continued, "and here's his picture," taking up a case from the table at her elbow. "That's him, his wife and little one," she added, proudly.

Marcia Lessinge gave it one startled glance and her head swam. Surely that was Harley, standing there beside that same lovely woman, something like she had seen them herself. A suffocating sense stole over her, but she asked faintly: "Your son, did you say?"

"Yes'm; perhaps you may have seen him. He resides at 122 West Fourth street this year; last year he rented farther up town, but it was more expensive."

"One hundred and twenty-two West Fourth street!" whispered Marcia Lessinge with bloodless lips, "and not Harley," and with a stifled cry she slipped to the floor.

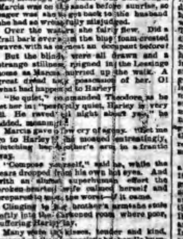
"Gracious me!" exclaimed the old lady, "the storm's been too much for her nerves," and working faithfully over the fainting Marcia she soon restored her to consciousness.

In a few minutes she opened her eyes. "Her son and not poor, abused Harley!" flashed through her mind. "O! it has been such a dreadful mistake!" she moaned aloud.

"Yes," answered the hostess; "to think of your being lost in such a storm is dreadful. It might have cost you your life."

Marcia replied in the affirmative, but faintly. She was inwardly thanking God that she had missed Clyde. This being lost had brought such a sweet relief in its revelation.

She could not sleep, but tossed about wondering, with many misgivings, if Harley was not distracted with grief at her absence. Poor Harley! She could remember, now that the other was off her mind, how kind and tender he had always been to her.



"GRACIOUS ME! WHY, COME RIGHT IN."

The morning dawned beautifully calm, and, although the water was still rough, Marcia was on the sands before sunrise, so eager was she to get back to the husband she had so wrongfully misjudged.

Over the waters she fairly flew. Did a frail bark ever skim the blue foam-crested waves with so earnest an occupant before?

But the blinds were all drawn and a strange stillness reigned in the Lessinge home as Marcia hurried up the walk. A great dread took possession of her. O! what had happened to Harley?

"Be quiet," commanded Theodore, as he let her in; "perfectly quiet, Harley is very ill. He raved all night about you," he added, meaningly.

Marcia gave a low cry of agony. "Let me go to Harley!" she moaned entreatingly, clutching her brother's arm in a frantic way.

"Compose yourself," said he, while the tears dropped from his own hot eyes. And with an almost superhuman effort the broken-hearted wife calmed herself and prepared to meet the worst—if it came.

Clinging to her brother's arm she stole softly into the darkened room where poor, suffering Harley lay.

Many were the kisses, tender and kind, pressed on the unconscious husband's burning brow; many were the tears of bitter contrition shed over that couch of pain before the light of returning reason dawned again in the fever eyes. But at last they beamed once more on her with the old love, stronger than [illegible] or death in their depths.

Then it was that Marcia hid her face on her husband's breast and made it her confessional. "I can never forgive myself for the days of pain I have caused you, Harley, dear!" And she sobbed out her repentant anguish in his arms.

"Never mind," he said, with tender, compassionate love, while his own tears mingled with hers; "never mind, we will be drawn closer together for having suffered.

"It was but a mistake, Marcia; and the world is full of mistakes."

MARIA L. CROCKER.

MR. TOAD'S MISTAKE.

He Swallowed a Bumble-Bee, but Finds It Too Hot for His Stomach.

The other day as I lay in my hammock I saw a huge toad winking and blinking lazily under the large leaf of a foliage plant, writes a correspondent of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Journal. He looked contented and happy, and just as if he didn't care whether school kept or not. A bumble-bee came buzzing around the flowers. That toad opened his eyes, looked around, deliberately winked one eye at me, and then, to all appearances, went to sleep again. He was not asleep, however, for the next moment, when the adventurous bee came a trifle nearer, he made a little spring, opened his countenance till I thought he would actually drop in two, there was a red flash—and the bee had disappeared. I was just beginning to wonder where it had gone, when I observed the toad begin to look melancholy. I then noticed that his white vest was puffed out like an alderman's. In less time than it takes to tell it he was the most lonesome-looking toad I ever saw. He seemed to reflect a minute, and then he got into the attitude in which the old prints represent Nebuchadnezzar when he was out to pasture. His big mouth was close to the ground, while his hind feet stood on tiptoe. He had swallowed something hot, and was now going to get rid of it by reversing the process. After several violent efforts, during which his whole anatomy heaved with emotion, the troublesome Jonah was ejected and lay on the grass before him. The toad wasn't winking at me any more. Instead he was venting looks of revengeful spite at the unfortunate author of all his troubles, which, by this time, presented a sorry appearance. Soon he cautiously approached, and, with a lightning like movement, the bee again disappeared, this time to stay. For a moment the toad moved cautiously, as if to avoid stirring up again that burning fire beneath his vest, and then, seeing that it was all right, hopped back with an elated air and went to sleep under the leaf.

HOW THEY COUNT OUR NOSES

As Each Decade Closes—Next Enumeration.

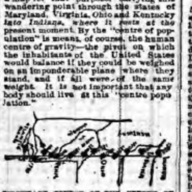
June, The Month of Roses—Work that It Imposes—Secrets It Discloses—How New England Loses—Growth of Population.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

Again, at the close of the round ten years, the Census Bureau is pinching itself and trying to wake up. Like the seventeen-year locust, between its periods of tremendous activity, it enjoys a sound sleep of several years, but it never actually dies. About 1884 it became comatose, and since that time there has been only one single clerk on deck to attest actual vitality. But last spring the President appointed Robert P. Porter its Superintendent, and signs of abundant life were at once apparent. Already two or three hundred clerks have been appointed to prepare for the national census of next June, and within six months Mr. Porter will have appointed 2,000 clerks and 40,000 enumerators to complete the immense work. Most of the clerks, whose tenure will be short, are already selected, and the local enumerators, whose official life will last only one month, are now being designated in the thousands of districts all over the country.

Up to the present time Porter and his assistants have been sheltered in private offices, but the hot hive is already crowded and in a month the workers will swarm and find new hives in different parts of the city which they will occupy exclusively. If any reader thinks that I am mixing metaphors in alluding to these people both as cicadas and as honey bees, he ought to stumble upon the Census Bureau when it is hibernating and when it isn't.

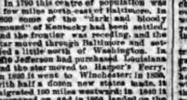
I give a view of the new census building which will be first occupied, but, two others like it and about as large, have also been leased. Superintendent Porter himself will occupy a suite of rooms in the Interior Department building, near to Secretary Noble, his superior officer.



THE NEW CENSUS BUREAU BUILDING.

The last census report comprised twenty-two very bulky quarto volumes, some of them very nearly as large and heavy as Webster's unabridged dictionary. When placed upon a shelf side by side, these volumes, with maps and other documents, measure eight feet from end to end. It is not only to take the census, and take it accurately and comprehensively, but to compile this tremendous statement of results that Porter is appointing his staff of experts and the clerks who will assist them.

I am able to-day to give an estimate of the location where the census of next June will place the centre of population. It is a curious study and an interesting showing. I have roughly drawn a map for that purpose, carrying this wandering point through the states of Maryland, Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky into Indiana, where it rests at the present moment. By the "centre of population" is meant, of course, the human centre of gravity—the pivot on which the inhabitants of the United States would balance if they could be weighed on an imponderable plane where they stand, and if all were of the same weight. It is not important that any body should live at this "centre population."



WESTWARD COURSE OF THE CENTRE OF POPULATION.

This little map makes several surprising revelations. The first is that only during thirty years out of a hundred has this centre of population lain within the so-called Northern States. The second is that it has all the while stuck closely to the 39th degree of latitude. If it had been a ring ten miles in diameter, in place of my star, it might have been strung upon this imaginary line and gone whistling westward without once leaving it in a century. It will be remarked, too, from the position of the star of 1800, when the Federal Government first came to Washington, how near the fathers of the Republic came to guessing at the location of the focus of their interests in 1792, even before the results of the rude census of 1790 were made known.

In 1790 this centre of population was a few miles north-east of Baltimore. In 1800 some of the "dark and bloody ground" of Kentucky had been settled, and the frontier was receding, and the star moved through Baltimore and settled a little north of Washington. In 1810 Jefferson had purchased Louisiana and the star moved to Harper's Ferry. In 1820 it went to Winchester; in 1830, with half a dozen new states made, it migrated 100 miles westward; in 1840 it journeyed on, and in 1850 landed on the banks of the Ohio. In 1860 and 1870 it journeyed through Ohio, and in 1880 was in Kentucky, just south of Cincinnati. It is now in Middle Indiana; in 1900 it will be in Illinois, and in 1910, if Powell's irrigation project pans out, it will shine on the more or less pellucid depths of the Mississippi. The pace of its migration is now increasing. The loss in New England, shown by the coming census, is expected to be very striking.

Besides bringing to the management of census such executive ability for the rapid despatch of business as a successful editor is pretty sure to possess, and the knowledge of the relation of things as a persistent student of economics ought to acquire, Mr. Porter brings an unusually wide acquaintance with public men and the advantage of experience as one of Gen. Walker's aids in the compilation of the Tenth Census. He has, moreover, great physical strength and superb health, a stocky, compact frame and a large head, giving him a sort of outline resemblance to Senator Gorman. He has also a special interest in the census, having increased it by five within the last six years, including a pair of twins. Mrs. Porter and the children are now at Deer Park, but they will come here in a few weeks, and, like the Pension Commissioner, the Census Superintendent will make his home on Georgetown Heights.

He will be primarily flanked in his work by twenty special experts, having salaries ranging from $1,800 to $5,000, each having charge of one of the grand divisions of the census. These have been appointed and have taken their work in hand. Mr. Porter looks upon Henry Gannett and Dr. J. S. Billings as his right bowers. Gannett has for years had charge of the mineral statistics of the Geological Survey, and will cover that and cognate divisions of the census. Billings has won fame as an army surgeon, and, though somewhat inclined to dogmatize concerning matters with which he is not acquainted, he will doubtless make a valuable compilation of vital statistics.

The law provides for 175 supervisors in the different states, with a salary of $500 each for the month or so during which they will be busy. The 40,000 enumerators will have about $25 apiece, and they will be engaged only during June. In the East they will get two cents for each name, and in sparsely populated regions a small per diem allowance besides. The census will be begun on June 1st, and in all cities of more than 10,000 it must be finished within two weeks.

The clerks and messengers employed here in the work of preparing instructions for the supervisors and of compiling and correlating the bewildering returns which the enumerators are expected to furnish, will get salaries ranging from $500 to $1,800 a year; but they will not be regarded as in the permanent service of the Government, and at the completion of the work they will be peremptorily dismissed.

It is the intention of the Superintendent to make the Eleventh Census more complete than any that has preceded it. Some subjects not hitherto covered will be exhaustively treated, and some interests will be presented much more compactly than in 1880. The preliminary plans are as yet somewhat nebulous, and I can speak only of tentative purposes.

Investigation into vital statistics will be more thorough than ever before. Most of the physicians of the country have been supplied with blanks on which to keep a current record, instead of depending on memory at the end of the year. The division, "Mortality," will be dropped, as being merely a subdivision of vital statistics. So with deafness, blindness, insanity, &c.

Church statistics will be gathered in such form as to be promptly available, inquiry touching the following salient points: organization, communicants, church edifices, seating capacity, value of property. The attention of the Superintendent has been called to the fact that the most important item, namely, average attendance has been omitted, and this may yet be added.

Under "occupations" a much fuller treatment of the activities and industries of the people is contemplated than has hitherto been undertaken.

An entirely new inquiry, specially authorized by Congress, will be the record of Union veterans of the civil war and the widows of soldiers.

The investigation of indebtedness is to be pushed farther than has hitherto been attempted, particularly in the inquiry into "recorded private indebtness" specially authorized by Congress. This is expected to settle the "mortgage" question, so much agitated.

It is intended to take account of the draft animals of cities, and of all horses, mules and cattle not kept on farms. This is an addition.

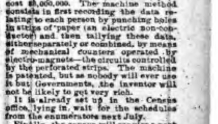
An attempt will be made to secure a rigidly statistical census. Arguments, deductions and references will be excluded, or, at least, will be minimized.

Matters hitherto treated exhaustively will not now receive the same attention. Cotton, which occupied two volumes of the Tenth Census and the cereals and tobacco, which made up another, will probably be included under one cover. General information concerning Forestry will not be repeated. Mineral resources will probably be put into one volume instead of three.

So with water power. This is dealing with fixed characteristics, and much of the previous work will not be repeated. But electricity, natural gas, etc., will receive increased attention.

The Superintendent purposes to have for the first time a full census of the public schools.

"Wages," which occupied a volume in the last census, will be remitted to the annual reports of Gen. Carroll D. Wright, Commissioner of Labor. But there will be an important report on machines and machinery.



THE ELECTRICAL INDICATOR.

Speaking of machinery I must not forget to say that the census returns will next year be, for the first time, in large part compiled by machinery and tabulated by electricity. In fact all of the future censuses of the world will doubtless be managed in the same way. I give a cut of this machine—the device of one of the special agents of the Census Bureau. The chief cost of the census is its tabulation, from the sheets returned by the enumerators. In 1880 this work cost $2,385,000, and if the same methods are employed, will next year cost $3,000,000. The machine method consists in first recording the data relating to each person by punching holes in strips of paper (an electric non-conductor) and then tallying these data, either separately or combined, by means of mechanical counters operated by electro-magnets—the circuits controlled by the perforated strips. The machine is patented, but as nobody will ever use it but Governments, the inventor will not be likely to get very rich.

It is already set up in the Census office, lying in wait for the schedules from the enumerators next July.

Finally, the census will require a vast amount of paper—not less than fifty tons for the preliminary work and 750 tons of card-board for the work of compilation.

W. A. CROFFUT.

—Prof. Hazen, stationed at the Mt. Washington signal station, has made a new and careful computation of the height of the mountain, and finds that it has a height of 6,300 feet above mean low tide. This is seven feet higher than previous measurements made it.

An Unfortunate Combination.

Lady of the house—"Well, sir, what do you want?"

Agent (affably)—"I have here a charming little book written by one of our greatest writers, which I think would be particularly interesting to you. It is called 'The White Horse of the Nile.' It is a beautiful—"

After the neighbors had tenderly extricated the remains from the front gate and had picked up the scattered leaves of the book, the lady of the house opened the door again, armed with a broom, and yelled, "Now, if there's anyone else in the crowd that wants to insult my hair, let them do it. I'm ready for 'em."

Rutherford's Bravery.

At the battle of Cedar Creek, in October, 1864, there was displayed great gallantry on both sides, and the mention of one particular deed of bravery is not intended to militate against the merits of thousands of others. In the afternoon, after Sheridan had completed his ride "From Winchester, twenty miles away," after he had reformed the lines of his shattered army and was advancing, the army of Western Virginia was ordered to charge across a morass. The Confederate troops were on the other side, with loaded muskets, and with artillery. The commander of one of the brigades in that army was an Ohio Colonel. He was fighting on foot, leading his men. The morass stopped the men, but the Colonel commanding the brigade went right on, floundering through mud almost waist deep. He was shot once and his clothes were actually riddled with bullets, but he went ahead, waving his sword, and the men followed. He was the first man over the slough. His name was Rutherford B. Hayes.

DEMOCRATIC TICKET.

FOR GOVERNOR,

LEON ABBETT,

OF HUDSON.

WHAT WE WANT.

We want a Governor who will be in reality, not merely in name, the Chief Magistrate of New Jersey.

A Governor who has the ability to be himself the Governor, and the capacity independence to positively refuse delegating the authority of his "high office" to deputies of any class or clan.

A Governor intimately acquainted with the affairs of State and the substantial interests of the people, and who will stand faithfully at the post of duty.

A Governor who will personally add dignity to the position and not cast reproach upon it.

Such a man is LEON ABBETT.

STICK TO THE TRUTH.

Among the many falsehoods uttered by Republicans against Governor Abbett's candidacy, one of the meanest we have heard was an attack upon him for attending the National Turn Fest, in Newark, when he was Governor. A minister in Jersey City advised his congregation to vote against him, giving afterwards as a reason, his attendance at this Festival and falsely representing that it was on a Sunday. Gov. Abbett did attend the Fest at Schuetzen Park, but it was on Monday and Tuesday, June 22 and 23 1885. The speech he made on that occasion may well be reproduced at this time as an answer to those who criticise his action on that occasion.

Members of the Turn Bund, it gives me great pleasure to meet you on this twenty-fourth annual festival of the North American Turners. The city of Newark and her citizens have opened their homes and hearts to you. I stand here to welcome you on behalf of the entire State of New Jersey. (Cheers.) When you look upon the members of the Turner societies of this country and throughout the world, their power and their influence, few of you may think of the early history of the man that was the founder of the society and whose grandson is among us today. (Cheers.) The man whom we all affectionately call Father Jahn, the founder of your society should never be forgotten. (Cheers.) He was born in the midst of a stormy period in the history of his native land. When he was but twenty-nine years of age, two battles were fought in Prussia that laid her prostrate at the feet of the foreign invader, and one year after that in a treaty made by the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia was despoiled of half of his dominions. Father Jahn was at that time a German professor, loving his books and his studies, but imbued with a spirit of liberty and love of Fatherland. When he saw the fair fields of his native country bathed in the blood of her sons; when he saw the ruthless trample upon her liberties, the spirit of the young man rose, and he determined to devote his whole life to the restoration of his country and to the defeat of the invader, and he made up his mind that the proper way to do it was to educate the people in physical culture so that they should be frisch, frei, stark and treu." (Tremendous Cheering.) He founded the Turn school in Prussia; they spread all over Germany; the people took the spirit of the man and knew that it was meant to educate the people to stand as soldiers to redeem Prussia. Well, Father Jahn had the privilege and pleasure of marching into Paris with the allied armies in 1815, and when he returned to Prussia, strange to say, these Turnvereine which were established all over Prussia, became a menace, as the kings thought, to imperial power. The dream of Father Jahn was a united Germany. He looked beyond the lines of Prussia; he wanted united into one mighty people all the nations that spoke the German tongue, and he preached it in his classes and his schools. And what think you, Germans that are proud of Germany, that is dear to your hearts. Remember that Father Jahn was five years in a fortress for preaching that doctrine in 1819. He was only in advance of his time. Jena, Waterloo, Sadowa and Sedan have made a united Germany, a nation powerful above all others. But it is not alone in Europe that the teachings of Father Jahn in these Turning schools have been productive of good; wherever German intelligence and valor have planted their language and customs, these schools have been of influence for good, and today throughout this great broad land they [illegible] in every State of the Union and I have pleasure in welcoming their representatives to this glorious little Commonwealth today.

WHAT THE COUNTRY OWES TO THE TURNERS.

This country owes to these societies and their teachings some of her best and bravest soldiers. (Cheers.) When Lincoln issued his proclamation calling for volunteers to fight for the preservation of the Union, the Turners poured their stalwart and strong-armed men into the Union armies. Some of the States indeed sent entire regiments, equipped by themselves, and today we have seen in these grand fields and on the streets of the beautiful city of Newark the tattered and torn battle flags of the Twentieth of New York. I can recall at this moment Weber, Blenker, Stahl, and a host of others—Turners all that went forth and came back covered with glory, and beneath the sod of the Southern States lie many a brave Turner. I am told that the Twentieth New York had Colonel Weber, who afterwards became General and was a Turner, and one of the bravest and best of men. But it is not only in times of war that the Turners can be called upon; in times of peace they are as a contented, happy and prosperous people. They bring, it is true, in their midst, the customs of their Vaterland, but I ask the man that decries them to remember what they have done for this land, to look upon the broad prairies of the West, where mighty States have been built by their energy and their strength for civilization. They have done no harm but only good; and I say that the man who would forget the land of his fathers and forget the home where the happy days of his childhood were passed, would deny the mother that bore him and be unfit to be an American citizen.

Wherever slavery is to be put down there you will find the Turners ringing forth their cry of "Salus Frei," wherever disorder is to be put down you hear the Turners ring out their cry and all is quiet; wherever tyranny is to be be abolished hear the Turners ring out their cry and down goes the flag of the tyrant; wherever there are corrupt men [illegible] you will find them singing out their cry and away they go with the Turners' [illegible].

To-night I again bid you welcome to New Jersey, hoping that you have had a pleasant time among our people, and will now only say in your own words "Gut Heil" in the name of all the people of the State. (Tremendous cheering, which lasted several minutes.)

The Law Doesn't Affect Plainfield Dairymen.

The dairymen of Burlington county have organized to secure the repeal or modification of the present Milk law by the next legislature. They say it is evident that there is something wrong about the present milk law. The standard is placed at too high a mark. During the past Summer a great deal of milk has been condemned as falling short of the requirements of law, and lost to the owners, that was undoubtedly put upon the market just as it came from the cows.

That it lacked in solids was no fault of the dairymen. The unusually wet Season no doubt affected the pasture, and Dame Nature, and not the dairymen, is to blame for the inferior milk. The law needs to be improved. It certainly is not right to entail loss upon the dairymen of the State by seizing their milk and subjecting them to law suits when they honestly put their milk upon the market as it comes from their cows.

Not a Democratic Funeral.

To the Editor of The Press:—The editor of the evening news last night displayed the fact that he is deplorably behind the times in journalistic matters, by the publication of the following harrowing information:

> During the Presidential campaign we said that the N. Y. Graphic was kept afloat by funds from the National Democratic Committee in the interests of Free Trade. Since the Free Traders failed to carry the election and were hurled from power by an indignant people, the paper has had a sorry time of it, and finally succumbed a few days ago.

There is no doubting that the Graphic "has had a sorry time of it," or that it did "finally succumb a few days ago," but the Democrats had nothing whatever to do with the "sorry time" or the succumbing, as the Graphic has been run on the staunchest high-tariff, Corporal Tanner, "chunks of five" Republican principles ever since last January. It has been "owned" in name by one Henry L. Stoddard (at a salary of $50 a week), but in reality by Steve Elkins and other rich Knights of big taxes; Tom Platt and Russell Harrison being mentioned as interested parties. The Graphic has lost money steadily ever since it fell into Republican hands, the loss for some weeks being, I am told, as high as $1,400. I say all this advisedly and might say much more; but this is sufficient to show that the Graphic has been a Republican and not a Democratic funeral, and that the editor of the evening news should be able to keep pace with modern journalism if he wants to talk about it.

CRITIQUE.

Not Believing That Prohibition Prohibits.

(From the [illegible].)

The Central Press of Plainfield, in responding to our question as to the consumption of liquors in that town, since it has become a "Prohibition" town, says that "it is not dealing in beer statistics this year," and then adds that Plainfield is "not a Prohibition town in any sense of the word," because "the Common Council which is the power that gives licenses, is not a Prohibition Council. The license members have a majority of one."

Nevertheless, as no licenses are granted in that city, it certainly is a town without the legal right to sell liquors, and, therefore, the right to sell is prohibited. Of course there is this distinction between it and, say towns in Iowa; that no town government, nor organized private society, exists for the purpose of enforcing the law against non-licensed places. The Council winks at the illegal sale, we suppose, and no society is formed to prosecute because the Council may change tactics and license any day.

Public sentiment, as is apparent by a majority for license in the Council, is not in favor of Prohibition in Plainfield. And as the closing of the saloons is an accident rather than an intentional occurrence, it may readily be seen that the full effects of Prohibition, so-called, cannot be expected under the circumstances in Plainfield.

Still it would be a remarkable fact if the consumption of liquors there, illicitly and unlawfully, were as great now as when licenses were granted; and it is this statement that the Times throws no light upon, and which until some light is thrown upon it we certainly cannot believe.

"TAX THE GUN."

Mr. Percy G. Ohl, of this city, writes as below to the Editor of the Fanciers' Journal of Philadelphia. The communication was published in that paper but a few days ago, yet it is being copied all over the United States and is endorsed as a just scheme, by many of the most prominent sportsmen of the country. This is the letter:

"Under the heading "Tax the Gun," there appeared in last issue of the American Field a very able article which should receive the attention of all sportsmen, and the subject should be brought before our Legislature the coming Winter, as something must be done to raise funds sufficient to assist in carrying out our game laws. Our game societies, however, are doing their utmost and deserve great praise. Having the honor of being the president of the New Jersey Game and Fish Protective Society, I can positively assert there is more quail in the State of New Jersey than there has been in the past ten years, and particularly so in the thickly populated and best guarded localities. So it is on Long Island, in New York and elsewhere, which plainly shows the good work accomplished by protection. Credit is also due to our game wardens, but as game wardens are generally dependent upon the arrest and conviction of the law breaker for his pay, he does not feel like leaving his business in search of some supposed violator, and the uncertainty of his reward will not warrant him giving the matter his attention.

"So it has been suggested, let us have paid officers, whose sole duty it shall be to assist in the protection of game. Friends or neighbors could not expect favors from them, as they would be paid for attending to their duty, and paid well.

"To avoid the taxation for this falling on any but those directly interested the remedy is simply to tax the gun. A tax of $1 per gun will give ample funds to secure a sufficient force of efficient officers.

"The game societies in several States receive quite a revenue from its members, and it is compulsory for non-residents in New Jersey, Delaware or Maryland to join a game protection society or purchase a shooting license. This brings in quite a little money, but the revenue thus obtained is not sufficient to give all the protection needed, and it has been clearly proved that only by protection game will flourish.

"So let us tax the gun, and hire police. The law would not be observed in our cities if it were not for the properly appointed officers; so we cannot expect the game laws to be unless enforced.

"Rifles, and especially the Flobert and other boys' rifles and guns should all be taxed alike and $50,000 to $75,000 a year could be raised in New Jersey alone. To avoid the annoyance of collecting this tax, make it compulsory for every person owning a gun to bring it to the justice of the peace or county clerk and receive a certificate or a metal [illegible] with the year stamped upon it.

"I shall be pleased to correspond with any persons or societies in this matter, and have a bill properly drawn to present at the next session of the New Jersey Legislature.

"Yours, etc.,
"PERCY G. OHL."

Somerville Fair.

The 20th Annual Fair of the Somerset County Agricultural Society will be held on their grounds in Somerville on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, Oct. 8, 9 and 10. Trotting Wednesday and Thursday, commencing at 12:30 P. M. each day.

Sale of the County Road Bonds.

Thursday at Elizabeth, the Board of Freeholders opened the proposals advertised for in THE PRESS, to buy the $120,000 worth of County Road Bonds.

There were many bids, but the successful purchasers were the Union County Savings Bank that took $15,000 at one per cent. premium, and Geo. A. Banwell who got the balance, $135,000, at 24-100ths above par.

Union County Gets Her Share.

During the past seven days the rainfall has been slightly above the average in the counties of Union, Mercer, Essex, Middlesex, Gloucester, Monmouth, Bergen, Atlantic and Burlington, falling on from three to five days out of the seven. The amount of sunshine has again been greatly deficient, while the temperature has been about the average for the last week in September. Light, harmless frosts occurred in a few localities on the mornings of the 22d and 23d. These conditions have been very unfavorable to all maturing crops; potatoes, tomatoes and corn suffering most.

Knights Templar Conclave at Washington.

The Central Railroad of New Jersey, in connection with the Philadelphia and Reading R. R. and the Baltimore and Ohio R. R., will sell excursion tickets to Washington, D. C., for the Triennial Conclave, to be held on Oct. 8 to 11, at single fare for the round trip. These tickets are good to go on Oct. 5, 6, 7 and 8, and for return until Oct. 31.

This line offers superior advantage in the way of elegant equipment, fast and frequent trains. Fare from Plainfield to Washington and return, $5.91.

They Form a Lodge in the Plainfield Wilderness.

Steps were taken Wednesday, Sept. 25, at the K. of P. Hall, corner Front street and Park avenue, for the purpose of forming a Lodge of Red Men in this city. That the enterprise will prove a prosperous one in the end is assured by the fact that at this time over 40 names have been enrolled on the application for a charter.

Another meeting was held on Wednesday evening, Oct. 2, at which time all who are or may be interested in the Order could signify their good intention by adding their name to the list. The Order is a beneficiary one, paying a weekly benefit in case of sickness or other disability; also a funeral benefit.

A Vocal Society in this City.

Lovers and advocates of vocal music will be glad to learn that a Vocal Society is about to be organized in this city, and it is the intention to give a series of subscription concerts during the coming Winter months.

A committee of ten, composed of some of the best people in the city, met in the First Baptist church Monday evening, and took the preliminary steps toward organizing the Society. It is proposed to limit the membership to 100, and a competent conductor will be engaged to rehearse the chorus.

Invitation will be sent out in the course of a few days, and a meeting will be held in Assembly Hall, probably next week, to complete the organization.

Those of our readers who remember the vocal concerts a few years ago, will doubtless give their hearty co-operation to have the affair crowned with success.

The Dangers of Electricity.

The late storm has seriously interfered with the street lighting and telephone service, and in some instances the wires were torn loose from their fastenings. One of the city liverymen had occasion to answer a call on Crescent avenue, a few evenings since, when he noticed a wire lying flat across the roadway. He endeavored to raise the wire and received such a shock that he was knocked off his feet. In other words he says, he saw stars while the heavens were obscured from sight by heavy clouds, and while it was raining hard.

The danger of encountering electric wires, is said to be doubly as great in wet weather as it is in the dry season, and too much precaution cannot therefore be exercised in wet weather.

Almost Blind and Very Poor.

Professor A. A. Starr, of Westfield, who for many years has been one of the best known lecturers on microscopical subjects in the country, is in a condition bordering on absolute want, and is forced to offer his instruments and collections for sale. He began the study of microscopy as far back as 1843, and shortly afterward began lecturing and giving exhibitions of microscopic forms of animal life. A few years ago cataracts formed over each of his eyes, and an operation was performed. The result was a total loss of one eye, while the other was so badly affected that he was forced to discontinue his work. His apparatus and collections are valued at about $2,000, and the management of the Vanderbilt University, at Nashville, Tenn., want the outfit, but are not able to incur the expense. But friends of Professor Starr and of the University hope that some public spirited man will come forward and enable the deal to be consummated. Professor Starr made many interesting discoveries with his microscope in animalcular life.

BISHOP VINCENT ON ROMANISM.

"I am keenly awake"—Bishop J. H. Vincent, formerly of Plainfield, is reported by the San Francisco Argonaut as saying in a recent address: "To the dangers that imperil our country; and the greatest peril of our country and civilization today, I take it, is the Roman Catholic church. It is doing more to subvert the republic, I verily believe, than any other thing. Its chief object of attack is our public school system, on which largely depend the future welfare and perpetuity of our country. The Roman hierarchy is seeking to subvert our school system in two ways. First, by establishing parochial schools as competitors of, and substitutes for, the State schools. The parochial school is un-American and ought to be abolished. And yet at the great educational convention, soon to be held at Nashville, emissaries of the Papal hierarchy will attempt by the shrewdest sophistries to convince the convention that the parochial school is in no sense inimical to the public school. Let us not be hoodwinked by their sophistries nor deceived by their Jesuitical jugglings—the parochial school is the enemy of the public school. In the second place, the Roman hierarchy seeks to destroy the public schools, not only indirectly, by displacement and substitution, but directly, by keeping up a persistent and malignant attack upon the schools themselves. Rome is the inveterate foe of free thought and free education. If the Papal church had its way in this country, it would close every public school in the land and compel our children either to receive their education at her hands or to go without education altogether.

"It is high time for the people of this country to wake up and realize that the Catholic church is plotting either to capture or destroy our public school system. It is our duty as American citizens to see to it that this free-school system—the palladium of the republic—shall be maintained and administered without any interference or dictation on the part of any sect or hierarchy."

Died in the Hospital.

William Traynor, a resident of East Third street, but for the past two months a patient in the Muhlenberg Hospital, died in that institution on Wednesday Sept. 25, from consumption. The deceased also suffered from an abscess in the side. He was about forty years of age, and leaves a widow and one child.

Hunting Her Husband, Who Left Her.

Mrs. Nellie Wilkey and her two children were passengers on the steamer State of Indiana and landed at Castle Garden Thursday. Mrs. Wilkey said that her husband deserted her in Glasgow, and that she heard he was in this country. She was sent here, she said, by the Edinburgh Woman's Protective Association. Three years ago her husband came here from Scotland and lived at Plainfield, N. J., for some time. They then went back to Scotland, where the husband deserted her. If he does not claim her she will be sent back to Scotland, as she is without means.

Lifted the Pants and Ran.

At 12 o'clock Friday a strange man, whose occupation is given as that of a painter, lifted a pair of pantaloons which were hanging in front of Mr. John M. Schorb's tailor shop on East Front street. He entered the doorway leading to Mr. Schorb's apartments and was about to exchange the new pair for the old ones he wore, when Mr. Schorb entered the hallway. The fellow tucked the pantaloons under his coat and started on a run toward Somerset street. He had not gone far, however, when he was apprehended, and the goods were returned to the owner, the thief being allowed to depart.

Wedding Bells.

At the residence of the officiating clergyman, on Milton place, Wednesday Sept. 25, at 7:30 o'clock, occurred the marriage of Mr. Herman Klinsman of West Front street, and Miss Augusta, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Christian Keller of Harrison street, North Plainfield. Rev. Mr. Schnellendreussler performed the ceremony.

About sixty young persons were present, including guests from New York, Jersey City, Newark and other distant points. Following the ceremony there was dancing and refreshments at the bride's residence, and the Plainfield Cornet Band also serenaded the newly wedded couple. Mr. and Mrs. Klinsman will reside in North Plainfield.

Plainfield Four Points Behind.

The event of Thursday at Marion—the third day of the N. J. Sportsman's Association tournament—was a State trophy shoot for a cup, teams of three men from clubs belonging to the association, $22.50 entrance for each team. The shoot was at 10 live birds per man, and resulted in a tie on 28 between the Jersey City Heights Club and the Newark Gun Club.

The team of Plainfield crack shots, announced in Wednesday's PRESS as representing the Middlesex Gun Club, came out but four points behind. Their score was:

S. G. Smith	0 1 0 1 0 1 0 1 1 1—6
Chas. Smith	1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 0—9
John Riggott	1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 1 0—9

A Light Fine Probable.

Among the bills of indictment presented by the Grand Jury of Somerset county, Thursday, was one against George Sanders, of North Plainfield, although it is understood that the members of the Jury from North Plainfield and its vicinity, abstained from voting for such indictment in view of the accused's subsequent reparation.

Sanders was arraigned this morning and plead guilty. Judge Magie placed him under $200 bail to appear for sentence, Monday Oct. 7. The same bondsmen qualified again, who went his surety while he awaited the action of the Grand Jury. The small amount of bail required by the court, seemingly implies that the sentence will be merely a light fine.

Look Out for the Stolen Rig!

At eleven o'clock Friday morning Timothy Burnett, a resident of Irvington, near Newark, reported at Police Headquarters that his horse and buggy had been stolen from in front of the Dime Savings Institution at that place. He said he tied the horse securely before entering the building, and when he returned to the street the rig had disappeared. He said the horse was in good condition, of a dark brown color, and eight years old. The buggy had in it a lap robe and a basket.

A description of the stolen property was at once sent to Elizabeth, Jersey City, Paterson, Plainfield, New York and Brooklyn. Any one who discovers the missing rig, will probably be handsomely rewarded, by forwarding information to the Irvington police.

Notes of the W. C. T. U.

Kitchen Garden commences at 4 o'clock on Monday and Tuesday, Oct. 7 and 8, and the Cooking class the following Saturday, Oct. 12, at 9 A. M.

The Gospel Temperance meetings for which the W. C. T. U. are arranging, to be conducted in November by Mr. Burdick of New York, should meet with the hearty and prayerful co-operation of all our Christian people.

The meetings of the W. C. T. U. which were held Sunday as usual, were deeply interesting. Mrs. Haviland of Chicago was present at the 4 o'clock meeting and her earnest words as a temperance worker for many years, held the wrapt attention of her large audience until nearly the close and the testimonies of many which followed, proved that the pledge and the gospel should go hand in hand.

DETECTIVE "MURPHY" IN THE SOUP.

Edward S. Worsley, alias "Murphy, the Detective," and firebug informer, who figured so conspicuously here during the trials of the Plainfield firebugs, about two years ago and subsequently mulcted the city out of about $1,500 in cold cash for his trouble, has turned up among the slums of Paterson, where he has been employed as a special policeman for some time past. Worsley has finally come to grief. Witness the following from the Paterson Daily Guardian of Tuesday, Sept. 24, 1889:

"Special Officer Worsley, against whom charges had been preferred by Chief Graul, was not tried last night, although the Aldermanic Police Committee met for that purpose. He some time ago created a big sensation in upper Broadway by firing shots at imaginary robbers whom he declared to be nightly prowling about that neighborhood, which he was employed to watch. His scheme was exploded by Policeman Kilt. For several days the police have been looking for Worsley, whose recent whereabouts were unknown. Notices of the charges against him and the time of his trial were sent to all his haunts, but he could not be found, and the committee was therefore unable to try him.

"After the committee adjourned, officer Kilt stated that special Worsley for some time had been laying siege to the heart of a dainty housemaid at a Broadway residence, with evident success, although the misguided girl was aware of the fact that the watchman was already a benedict. On Friday last the girl left town for Plainfield, the former stamping ground of the whilom special, and about the same time Worsley also disappeared. There is a big brother in the case, and it is not at all unlikely that he may have something to say about the future movements of the pair."

WASHINGTONVILLE WHISPERS.

The Progress of the New Chapel.

Mr. Pease of Plainfield, conducted the evening service Sunday week at the school house. It is hoped soon to be able to hold services in the new chapel now in course of erection. Mr Sellery, with a force of masons, is at work on the walls. Enough of the rough stone work, with its natural face exposed, is completed to show the general design of architectural beauty with which it is to be finished. It is expected the carpenters will begin work this week and then the building will be finished as fast as expedient. The Building Committee hope to have it ready for Thanksgiving service.

Hurlbut Chautauqua Circle.

A public meeting of the Hurlbut Circle, C. L. S. C., for organization and election of officers, will be held in the parlor of the Young Men's Christian Association, Thursday evening at 7.45 o'clock.

The original Hurlbut Circle, the first in Plainfield, was organized by Dr. Hurlbut at his home, Sept. 27, 1883, with 45 members. Sept. 18, 1884, Circle No. 2 was formed by him, with 40 members. The two were united in the Fall of 1886 as the Hurlbut Circle. The Circle has always been friendly, yet independent, and it is the desire to so keep it. Mr. Robert Gorton is the President.

The Circle will be glad to welcome at the coming meeting all friends or strangers desiring to join with them in the readings for the coming year.

The Opinion of a Great Soldier.

Just forty-eight hours before he died, that great soldier, General Hancock, wrote as follows about Gen'l Mulholland whose pictures of Gettysburg are to be exhibited at Music Hall, Wednesday, the 16th inst.:

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, N. Y., Feb. 4, 1886.

Mr. Matt Morgan:

My Dear Sir—Your favor of January 27th was only received by me on the 30th inst., and my confinement to the house since that date by a temporary indisposition has further delayed its acknowledgment.

In answer to your inquiry I would suggest as your military adviser and critic General St. Clair A. Mulholland, of Philadelphia, who was an officer of distinction during our civil war, and is a professional painter of some repute. He has just returned to this country from a residence abroad for several years—in London and Paris chiefly—and is engaged, I believe, in writing some war papers for "The Century." At this moment I can think of no one truer from bias or more useful to you.

I am, very truly yours,
WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK.

The New Jersey Grand Lodge to Meet in Plainfield.

The largest of secret beneficial and fraternal organizations, paying death benefits out of one general fund, is said to be the Knights of Honor organized in 1873 with seventeen members, and numbering today 131,000 members. It pays for death benefits over $200,000, monthly, and annually over $3,000,000. It has paid on 14,176 death claims, $38,086,534.26. The amount of death claims paid in New Jersey from Oct. 1, 1888 to Sept. 1, 1889, was $30,000. The death benefits paid by the Knights of Honor are $500, $1,000, and $2,000.

The Grand Lodge of New Jersey will meet Wednesday, October 9, in Reform Hall. There will be about 115 delegates present representing a membership of 4,015. There are 48 Lodges in this State, divided into 22 districts, each district in charge of a Deputy who visits the Lodges under his charge. Past Dictator F. P. Haffner will represent Wetumpka Lodge, No. 3,401, in the Grand Lodge, this session. Past Grand Dictator E. V. Lorton is also a member of this Grand Lodge.

Wetumpka Lodge, No. 3,401, will meet Thursday evening, Oct. 3, and there will be initiation. This Lodge was instituted April 19, 1889, with 33 members and numbers today about 52 members. Mr. John H. Doane, is Dictator. Mr. Horace J. Martin, is Reporter.

FREED FROM CONTEMPT.

In the little office of the Overseer of the Poor, lighted by one kerosene lamp with a broken chimney, and overheated by a base burning stove, city court was held Thursday evening.

Judge Stillman presided; Corporation Counsel Marsh appeared for the city; Charles A. Reed, Esq., represented the appellant; James O'Neill, who was also present; the audience included Chief Carey, Detective Sliter, and the PRESS reporter. The case was a simple one. O'Neil had failed to appear on time when summoned as a witness in the case of the City vs. Sullivan for illegal liquor selling. When he arrived a few minutes after the case was adjourned, he was fined $20 by the court for contempt.

That evening he was granted a hearing in his defense, but the Corporation Counsel saved him that trouble by gracefully suggesting the withdrawal of the fine.

Mr. Marsh said: "In the matter of the citation of James O'Neill to show cause why he should not be fined for failing to appear in answer to subpoena, I have learned the facts from Chief of Police Carey, and upon such facts, I am clearly of the opinion that a fine cannot be imposed for the reason that the time between the service of the subpoena and the time fixed therein for witness' appearance in court, being only half an hour, is altogether too short to authorize a higher court to adjudge a witness guilty of contempt, or the city court to impose a fine.

"There is no doubt whatever of the power of this court to fine jurors or witnesses for failure to answer its writs. But such action must needs be predicated on the due, legal and timely service of such writs. Service at the residence of witness half an hour before court, is certainly not timely service. The authorities hold that at least one day's notice is necessary, however inconsiderable the distance may be between the place of service and the court. Greenlief cites a case where service in the morning to attend in the afternoon of the same day was held to be insufficient, though the witness lived in the same town and very near to the place of trial.

"That the courts of this State conform to this rule is clear from the remarks of Vice Chancellor VanFleet in Johnson vs. Corey, in which case, in granting a rule to show cause why a witness should not be punished for contempt—the witness having been served the day before time fixed for his appearance in court—the Vice Chancellor said that if it appeared that the witness was necessarily absent attending to his business, the order would be discharged, for he thought that the notice was much too short, especially to a business man.

"Holding these views, I deem it my duty to suggest to your Honor that no fine be imposed in the present case because not warranted by the facts."

Judge Stillman adopted the suggestion, and O'Neill was purged of contempt and saved the fine. Before adjournment of the court, however, Lawyer Reed expressed his entire concurrence with the views of the Corporation Counsel, but at the same time stated that he should maintain in every instance of the kind where he was concerned, that the court he was then addressing had no right to impose a fine for contempt of any kind or in any manner.

Mr. Marsh replied that the Court had repeatedly, during the last eight years, exercised its statutory powers to fine witnesses or jurors for failing to answer when properly served, and every case of the kind that might arise in the future would be treated in the same way.

Judge Stillman concurred in the view expressed by the City Counsel, and stated that otherwise the Court would be unable to enforce obedience of command [illegible].

Awarding Bridge Contracts.

A committee from the Union county Board of Freeholders met in this city, Monday afternoon, and awarded two bridge contracts to the Wrought Iron Bridge Co., of Canton, Ohio. The bridges are to be of the iron girder pattern. One over Cedar Brook at Arlington avenue, 30 feet wide and 30 feet roadway was contracted for $1,046, and the other over Cedar Brook at Randolph road, 25 feet wide and 20 feet between walls, was contracted for $739.57.

FIGHTING FOR FRANCE'S FORTUNE.

The France Lee will contest, which for prolixity promises to rival the famous case of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce, was revived Monday in the Union County Court at Elizabeth, when a struck jury was picked out to try the issue between the Scotch Plains Baptist church, to whom the miser and hermit, France Lee of Plainfield, bequeathed the bulk of his property, worth $200,000, and the hermit's natural heirs, Ezra and Daniel Hetfield, who claim that the testator was insane when he made his will.

The claimants are uncles of the deceased, and are respectively 89 and 92 years old.

Residents of Plainfield and Scotch Plains were excluded by mutual consent from the jury, which has been picked out from the other townships of the county.

R. V. Lindabury represents the contestants, and Jackson & Codington of this city, the church. Mr. Lindabury says that his clients made a perfectly square offer of settlement by dividing the estate, but the church authorities refused.

NOT RED "SKINS".

To the Editor of The Press:—I wish to state most emphatically that I protest against the practice of permitting cigar signs to wander on our public highways unaccompanied by their cigar stores. While on my way to Scotch Plains the other day, I encountered four and a-half of these articles and received a severe mental shock.

During a three years' sojourn in the far West, I frequently encountered the same species of bric-a-brac and have been scalped on several occasions. Therefore, although this band made no effort to pursue me, to find four and a-half clean Indians so far from the plains, (Scotch Plains), was too much. I fled precipitately, in spite of the tender memories of the gentle and considerate treatment often received at the hands of their kind.

I see by your paper this evening that they were not cigar signs, but were advertising Indian remedies. I most humbly beg their pardon. By the way, you also owe them an apology for they are genuine Indians, and not as you stated—red "skins."

PAUL PILGRIM.

JERSEY CENTRAL'S DEPOT.

The new station of the Central Railroad of New Jersey is considered to be one of the finest structures of the kind in this country. The building is of brick, three stories high and covers an area of 128 by 215 feet. An imposing tower stands in the centre of the building, on which is erected a clock fourteen feet seven inches in diameter, and which is one of the most noticeable objects in the harbor, next to the Statue of Liberty.

The central or main hall, which is open to the roof, is 64 by 96 feet, and surrounding this are the ticket offices, restaurants, toilet rooms and smoking rooms. On the second floor are the executive offices of the company, which have just been completed. The ladies' parlor is furnished with plush sofas, handsomely upholstered armchairs, willow rockers, axminster carpets and hardwood walls. The wainscoting of the room is of yellow English glazed brick, with black trimming.

The train shed contains twelve tracks, the six odd numbers of which are used for the incoming trains and the six even numbers for those outward bound. The platforms between the tracks are fourteen feet in width and twelve inches higher than the roadbed.

The striking feature of the train shed is its light and cheerful appearance. The walls are of brick and the roof of iron and glass. The main span of the roof is 144 feet, and in the centre is a skylight the whole length of the shed, which is 512 feet and 55 feet, in width. A series of steel bars gives support to the immense area of glass, with bearings at intervals of thirteen feet. The outer end wall is of glass. The roof of the station contains 28,000 square feet of glass. Boilers for heating and electric lights are in a separate building. Four dynamos are employed, and four boilers furnish steam for heating the building and passenger cars.

The new signal tower connected with the yards, when finished, will communicate with the round house, a distance of one mile and a quarter, by a system of newly devised electric signals. The signal man, by pressing a properly marked button, will throw up a placard in the roundhouse, denoting the particular train that he wishes to take its place in the station for departure on the road. It is understood that the arrangement is so contrived that there can be no confusion, and it is impossible for a false signal to be made, as the placard always has gravity to overcome in reaching the observation point. The proper check signals are automatically returned to the tower. Another system of signals between the tower and train house is being put in to govern and record the departure of trains, and one between the train house and the superintendent's office, showing the exact time of their arrival and departure. Conductors' reports are to be forwarded to the superintendent's office by a pneumatic tube.

The general waiting room, with its tiled floor, rises to a height of over sixty feet. In the matter of light and ventilation this apartment is considered one of the best examples in the country.

The building of this great structure was considered a necessity, owing to the great rush to and from the Summer resorts along the Jersey coast. Each of its twelve tracks will hold fifteen cars, which give facilities for moving away 12,600 passengers, each provided with a seat. The number of trains arriving and departing daily from the station is 190. It is estimated that 2,850 cars, with 195,500 passengers, can be handled every twenty-four hours. The sum of $600,000 has been expended on the depot and the four new ferry slips connected with it.

With the opening of this new station an extensive interlocking plant was put into operation. The old tracks approaching the station were removed and replaced with 76-pound rails. The yard had to be regraded, and it is the intention to put in rock ballast as soon as the filling has settled. Every conceivable movement of cars between the station tracks and the main tracks of the main line and Newark branch is now easily made by means of the new interlocking system. Certain tracks are reserved for switching purposes. The radius of the slip switches is 500 feet.

Three men are stationed in the tower to attend the levers, and two of these are always occupied observing charts, which show the proper order in which the levers are to be pulled. An idea of their work may be gained when it is known that the system embraces 42 facing-point locks and signals, governing 80 routes, making 22 levers for 40 switches, and three movable frogs, one lever for two movable frogs, 24 levers for 48 facing-point locks, 22 levers for 40 signals and 40 indicators and one facing-point lock—a total of 68 working levers.

—The Hebrew stores in the city were closed all day Thursday in honor of the Jewish New Year.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

KASKINE,

Mrs. George Crook, of Wadsworth, Nevada, with her infant son, arrived in Plainfield, Thursday, and will remain indefinitely with the family of her brother-in-law, Mr. J. C. Reed, of No. 20 Essex street. Mrs. Crook and her sister, Mrs. Reed were both married in this city about a year ago. The former went to the far West with her husband, where they permanently located.

Escape from a Washout.

A young man named Giddis and a companion were seated in a buggy driving along Somerset street a little beyond Tumber's Hotel Tuesday last week, when the vehicle ran into a washout and the occupants were thrown out promiscuously in a deep gully. Fortunately they escaped injury.

The accident was due to the contemptible trick of some person or persons unknown in carrying off the danger signals placed there at night by the township officials. This is not the first time the lamps have been carried away or broken, and the offenders should be apprehended and made to answer as law and justice demands.

Annual Election.

The annual meeting for election of officers of the Young People's Association of the Crescent Avenue church, will be held on Friday evening, after prayer meeting, at Bethel chapel.

Popular Meeting of City and County Young People.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the First Presbyterian church are making extensive plans for a popular meeting for the young people of the city and county, to be held in their church the evening of Oct. 17.

Rev. F. E. Clark of Boston, who is at the head of the Christian Endeavor work of the country, has fortunately been secured to give the principal address of the evening.

Special attention is being given the music which will be furnished by representatives from the various churches. Further notices will be given later.

The Somerville Fair.

The Twentieth annual fair of the Somerset County Agricultural Society will open at Somerville on Tuesday, October 8, and continue throughout Wednesday and Thursday. The grandest field of trotters ever assembled on these grounds will be there on the second and third days of the fair, including the winners at Trenton on Monday last. Wednesday's programme will include a special county race for a purse of $150; a $300 purse for the 2.25 class; a $250 purse for the 2.40 class, and a race for 4-year-olds for $100.

On Thursday there will be double team racing, besides races for the 2.30 and 3.00 minute class. A purse of $500 is offered for the free-for-all. The agricultural and household exhibits, will exceed those of former years.

The Truth about Anthony vs. Anthony, and Anthony vs. Ballou.

Mrs. Ida M. Anthony throughout the litigation instituted by her against her husband and Miss Ballou, has sought to avoid publicity, and naturally feels annoyed when, besides the publication of certain facts, much of error and misstatement is added. In view of the inaccuracy and bad taste of the publication referred to, the following brief statement was obtained by THE PRESS from Mrs. Anthony's counsel, Craig A. Marsh:

It is not true, as has been published, that the suit against Miss Ballou for damages was not pressed. It was pressed, and with such effect that the latter settled the case by assigning a substantial part of a legacy left her by her grandfather. Complainant has never expressed the intention of resuming her maiden name. All that it is necessary to say in the subject of the suit brought by her for divorce is that the Court has granted her an absolute divorce, permanent alimony, counsel fees, and the custody of her daughter.

Are the Plainfield People Ignorant or Heedless?

The list of attractions already presented at Music Hall, this season, and those to follow, reflect great credit upon the management and should command the appreciation of the public. But such appreciation has not yet been felt.

Tuesday night's presentation of "Capt. Swift" was perfect in every way. Messrs Forrest and Huntington, and Misses Eytinge and Kimball were especially good, and the entire company was far ahead of what Plainfield deserves. But the audience was disgracefully small.

New York does not get anything better than Frederick Warde gave Plainfield last week, nor anything better than Louis James will give next week. But the people of this city and the Borough literally don't patronize Music Hall "for a cent."

As the boys say: "What's the matter with Plainfield, anyhow?" Is it ignorance or heedlessness that causes the light houses at the first-class attractions offered at Music Hall? The people fairly hollered for an opera house when there was none, and now they don't seem to know what a play is when they hear of it.

A Reception to Plainfield's Mechanics.

Notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, a goodly number of young men attended—in response to the invitation of the Y. M. C. A.—the reception tendered Tuesday night to the young men in the shops engaged in mechanical pursuits. They were gladly received by the Reception Committee, and were made to feel entirely at home by the hearty speech of welcome by President Murray.

Mr. A. J. Gavett explained the object and aim of the classes in mechanical drawing. These classes were very successful last year and there is no doubt will be equally so during the coming year. The principal part of the entertainment of the evening was furnished by Mr. Charles H. Little, humorist, of New York. It certainly was a treat to hear him. His witty remarks, and really good jokes, kept the audience almost continually convulsed with laughter; while his excellent character delineations were received with uproarous applause.

Mr. David E. Titsworth sang two solos in a charming manner, much to the delight of the young men. Mr. Titsworth never sang better in his life. His voice is steadily improving. It is regretted that the storm kept some away from this really enjoyable reception, but there will be others at intervals during the season. The "Ladies Nine" furnished coffee and cake.

PLAINFIELD CRESCENT LEAGUE.

By a unanimous vote of the Plainfield Bowling Club present at a meeting held Sept. 25, the name of the organization was changed to the Plainfield Crescent League, and Counsellors John Ulrich and Charles A. Reed were instructed to file the necessary certificate of incorporation thereof. Messrs F. M. Slater, R. M. Stelle, C. C. Burnet, A. W. Waldron, C. P. Leggett, J. T. Fritts and Seymour G. Smith, were unanimously elected a Board of Trustees for the ensuing year.

Further business of the meeting occupied the entire evening, and much was accomplished towards the speedy completion of the proposed club house. The assessment of ten dollars that had been made upon each of the members, was rescinded; but subsequently $600 was voluntarily contributed among those present with which to begin at once the work of refitting the building already leased on East Second street. It is expected that the alleys will be finished by Oct. 15.

The bowling team that has been selected by Captain James Davis to represent the Plainfield Club in the Union County League, will be picked from the following who have been notified to meet regularly for practice at once: H. Van Emburgh, E. C. Kirb, C. A. Reed, C. Teel, Jno. Ulrich, H. Teel, Rogers, C. Van Winkle, Thiers, Baker, Emerson, A. V. Kline and Davis. To Lecture in Plainfield.

George Kennan, the great Siberian traveler and author of the very interesting and much talked of articles on Siberia in the Century magazine, will deliver a lecture in Music Hall for the benefit of Muhlenberg Hospital, about the middle of November.

A Cross Match.

Great though suppressed excitement was occasioned in Music Hall, Tuesday, after the play commenced, by the entrance of a young white man of this city escorting a young black woman. They had orchestra seats and were entirely at ease in their conversation and actions during the entire performance, although the cynosure of all eyes.

Recommending a Girder Bridge.

A joint committee from the Union and Somerset County Boards of Freeholders met in this city on Monday afternoon, to take action with reference to rebuilding the Somerset street bridge over Green Brook. The Somerset county delegation, it is said, were unanimous in recommending the erection of an iron girder bridge at that point, and their recommendation will be reported at the next meeting of the Board.

Mr. J. B. Cleaver at Reform Hall.

Mr. Cleaver of the First Church of Christ, preached in Reform Hall, Sunday morning, another of his highly instructive and thoroughly entertaining sermons. Mr. Cleaver's subject was, "The Promise on to the Fathers." Mr. Cleaver quoted from twenty-two different chapters during his discourse, and the subject was handled with ability and force. It is Mr. Cleaver's purpose in the near future to preach on the "Second Coming of Christ."

A Match Between Class and Brewer.

Frank Class, of Pine Brook, recently challenged John R. Brewer, of Philadelphia, to shoot a match at 100 live birds for $250 a side, and Brewer has accepted. The time and place have not been arranged, but both men appear to mean business. Brewer claims a record of 99 birds out of 100 and Class is one of the best shots in the State.

Both of the above crack shots will doubtless be present at the Middlesex Gun Club tournament at Dunellen, next week, and the match may possibly take place at that time.

Conference at Cranbury.

The local conference of the Y. M. C. A. was held at Cranbury on Sunday. There were delegates present from New Brunswick, Plainfield, Princeton and elsewhere. The pulpits of three churches were filled in the morning by delegates from New Brunswick and Plainfield. Meetings were held in the morning, afternoon and evening, and addresses were made by the different delegates. The delegation from this city were Messrs Stephen Cahoone of the District Committee, and E. L. Suffern. The latter addressed a mass meeting in the evening.

Eleven Innings Played.

The most interesting game of ball between the "Young Crescents" of this city and the "Young Americans" of Dunellen, was played on the Evona grounds, Saturday afternoon. It was an eleven-inning game and resulted in a score of 10 to 9 in favor of the Young Americans. The umpire was considered very fair. The pitching of D. Force, the catching of W. Thiers and the running catch of J. Sutphen were the features of the game. The batteries were: D. Force and W. Thiers for the Young Crescents, and Richards and Burke for the Young Americans. D. Force struck out 13 and Richards 7. Following is the score by innings:

Young Crescents	0	1	1	0	0	3	2	1	1	0	0	— 9

Robbed of $400.

Carl Nordorsky, a German farm hand, came to this country several years ago in search of health, home and happiness, such as is found only in "the land of the free and the home of the brave." For the past two years the man has been employed by Mrs. Bloom on her farm in Washington Valley, and by thrift and economy he managed to lay up about $400 in cash. Recently he left the farm with the expressed determination of returning to Germany and wedding one of the village maidens in his native town.

A few days ago Carl left the Plainfield station with a light heart and a roll of bills. Arriving in New York he purchased his ticket for Germany, and having some time to spare before the vessel sailed, he wandered about the metropolis taking in the sights, when he was accosted by two of his fellow countrymen, to whom he related his plans. The three men entered a beer saloon and Carl says he was there induced to drink a glass of beer. That was the last he remembered of his companions and money, for when he awoke both were missing.

Carl has postponed his trip to Germany indefinitely, and meanwhile his intended bride must be content to hear from him occasionally.

Convicted of Being One of the 42 Unlicensed Liquor Dealers in Plainfield.

In the City Court, on Monday, before Judge Stillman, was tried the four charges against Michael F. Watson for selling liquor without a license. Counsellors Walter Hatfield of this city, and Fred Marsh of Elizabeth, appeared for the accused but offered no defence, and Watson was fined $100 on each of the four charges.

James Doty, who drives an ice wagon for Mr. John Morton, testified that he had ordered rye whiskey in Watson's place, drunk it, and paid for it, and had also treated Andrew Muir. This testimony the latter, who is a special policeman and an employee at the Potter Press Works, corroborated. The accused's lawyers stated they did not desire to interpose any defence before that Court, and Judge Stillman promptly put on Watson the full penalty allowed in the way of a fine, $100.

Doty and Muir testified that on another occasion they had bought beer in Watson's place; and Charles Peterson and Billy McGrady swore they also got beer of Watson. There was no defence offered to either of these charges, and the Court added $200 more to Watson's fine.

Peterson then testified that he had been hired to go with Chief Carey in a buggy to Watson's place at Grant avenue and Second street, on the night of Aug. 17. He had gone in and bought a half-dozen bottles of beer, put them in the buggy and he and the Chief had taken them to the latter's office. The Chief was then put on the stand, and the beer itself offered in evidence. Judge Stillman fined Watson another hundred, and the Court adjourned after agreeing to give the counsel for the defence a few days to file their appeal bonds. The cases will be carried to another court.

St. Mary's Fair.

The fair in aid of St. Mary's church, which has been in progress in the parochial school hall for several days past, closed on Saturday evening. The contest for the black walnut desk was decided in favor of the Emerald Benevolent Society. These amounts were collected in for the desk:

Emerald Society	$182.00
Temperance Society	56.75
I. M. C. L. U.	34.00
Total	$272.75

Miss Meade was awarded the ten dollar gold prize.

For the Cause of Religion.

Simultaneous meetings, in behalf of the cause of foreign missions, were held two years ago, under the direction of the Presbyterian Synod of New Jersey, in nearly all the churches of that denomination, throughout the State. Considerable enthusiasm was aroused and such increase of interest followed that it has been resolved to repeat the movement this Fall.

The committee appointed by the Synod have set apart, for that purpose, the week, Nov. 3 to 10, and are making arrangements to secure the co-operation of every church, Sabbath school and missionary society.

The 300 Presbyterian churches in this State, with their 56,293 members, and the 64,280 members of the 352 Sabbath schools, will find an opportunity, in the coming November simultaneous meetings, which may well enlist their deepest enthusiasm.

A resolution was adopted that a National Board, to be composed of the Legislative Committees of the State Boards, should be formed to secure necessary legislation. The following officers were elected:

LAST OF THE SEASON.

The Crescents played their last game of the season, Saturday afternoon, and a very interesting game it was. It was a battle of batteries in which the Currie Bros., came out ahead, although Armitage held the Winthrops down to one hit until the sixth inning.

When the game opened Will Currie had not arrived and Bowes caught for the enemy also, during the first two innings. Steinert made three fine catches, and McLaughlin got the only one within reach of the Crescents' fielders.

Bergen covered second base in his usual good shape, and made two of the four hits for his side. He is the West Ender who THE PRESS said, on Aug., 12, Somerville could not appreciate. The score was in detail:

THE PROPOSED STREET RAILWAY.

An Enthusiastic Meeting in the Republican Association Rooms, Monday Evening—Mr. Leo Daft Gives the Estimated Cost of the Road—Resolution Adopted Favoring the Project.

In response to a notice sent out, a fair representation of the citizens gathered in the Republican Association rooms Monday evening, to consider the matter of organizing an incorporation for the purpose of applying for a franchise to operate the Daft Electric Street Railway system here. Mr. John W. Murray was elected chairman and Mr. J. B. Coward, secretary.

The chairman stated the object of the meeting, and after a few preliminary remarks, Mr. Daft addressed those present. Among other things he said that it was the intention to use the Johnson girder rails in the construction of the proposed street railway, the rails to be placed on steel chairs, the latter to rest on chestnut ties about eighteen inches under the surface of the roadbed. By so placing the ties, Mr. Daft said it would only be necessary to replace them once in every eighteen years.

The route as laid out makes a continuous line of about four miles, and the consent of over 90 per cent. of the property owners along the route has been obtained. About $45 daily expenditure will maintain the road. The total cost of the road and its equipment will be about $64,606, divided up as follows:

Cost of track	$28,356
Seven cars	28,000
Real estate	1,500
Buildings	1,500
Dynamo	2,500
Wiring	750
Preliminary expenses	500
Legal expenses	1,500
Total	$64,606

Mr. Daft said that it was intended to issue $70,000. He further stated that outside capitalists would be connected with the corporation, but for strength and confidence it was desired that some Plainfield capital be invested in the road.

In answer to a question, Mr. Daft said it would cost about $7,000 per mile to extend the route. Cars are to be run on the ten-minute schedule between six A. M., and 9 P. M., and at intervals of twenty minutes from 9 P. M., until midnight. This will average 18 trips a day for each car.

Freeholder Vanderbeek, James E. Martine and others spoke in favor of the proposed road, after which Corporation Counsel Marsh introduced the following resolution, which prevailed:

Resolved, That this meeting is heartily in favor of the project and believes that the best interests of the city will be subserved by its success.

The meeting then adjourned.

—Plans are being laid for numerous amateur theatrical and musical ventures for the coming Winter.

Additional Mails.

In accordance with general orders, a morning mail is now despatched each day from the Plainfield post office, going West on the 9:12 A. M. train, and one also received from the West on the 2:25 afternoon train. These additions, with the late evening mail of eight o'clock, recently established, greatly increase the labor of the clerks in the post office.

A Bachelor's Club Organized.

A club of young men, which is to be known by the above title, was organized on Monday, with about 20 charter members. The club has handsomely fitted up rooms in the White and Stelle building, on the Park avenue side. The following officers were elected:

President—David J. Carney.
Secretary—John L. Force.
Treasurer—A. C. Blair.

Opening Court.

The October term of the Union county courts opened at Elizabeth, on Tuesday, when the Grand Jurors were sworn. Judge VanSyckle delivered his charge to the jury, after which the members at once entered upon their duties. Court then adjourned until Wednesday, after granting five liquor license applications.

The Grand Jurors from here are: Messrs John B. Brown, M. Esill, George W. Cole and George C. Mahon.

From Fanwood—Hezekiah Hand.

A Plainfielder Injured at Elizabeth.

The Elizabeth Journal of Monday says: "Early last evening Officer Walsh was informed that an old man had been injured on West Grand street near Price. He went to the place and found the old gentleman who could not tell how he was hurt, but it was presumed he had fallen down. He said he lived near Plainfield, and the officer took him to police headquarters, where he remained until this morning. He gave the name of Stephen E. Boughton."

Burdened With Gifts.

Masters Seymour and George Smith, and Roland Tomlinson, have also sent gifts to Willie Hamilton. THE PRESS must ask its generous friends to send nothing more unless it is a subscription—no matter how small or large—towards purchasing the invalid chair proposed.

One wagon load of books and toys received, has been sent already to Willie who is so surfeited with such things now that the surplus yet on hand will be sent to the Children's Home.

Dunellen Personals.

Mr. A. M. Smith and wife of Franklin Furnace, N. J., are visiting at the residence of Mr. W. J. Hamilton.

Mr. Alvah Gray has purchased the land opposite the engine house and will erect a neat cottage thereon.

Mrs. Brackhamer and daughter of Dunellen, have gone to Joliet, Ill. on a visit.

Mr. Leonard Benton and wife of New York city, spent last Sunday at his home here.

Of Interest to Milkmen.

An interesting case was tried in Trenton a few days ago, under the State milk law, which was stoutly resisted in South Jersey over a year ago. The law requires 12 per cent. of solids in the milk, and a sample taken by Health Inspector McGuire from one of the cans belonging to F. B. Crossdale, of Ewing, proved, upon analysis by Shippen Wallace, the chemist, to contain only 11.62 of solids.

These facts were brought out in the Justice's Court, but the defence contented itself with proving that the milk was fresh from the cow and not adulterated with water or other substance. It is said that the reason it failed to come up to the legal standard was that the cows were fed on new clover. The jury acquitted Crossdale.

—The Y. M. C. A. classes in mechanical drawing will be resumed on Tuesday evening, October 8. A new class will be organized at once and commence work on the 15th. Information given and names enrolled at the Association rooms.

—It is really amusing to hear the criticisms on the ball grounds concerning the relative merits of one or the other of the teams. Some of those who criticise the players so strongly, scarcely know the difference between a foul tip and a home run.

Many young children become positively repulsive with sore eyes, sore ears, and scald head. Such afflictions may be speedily removed by the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Young and old alike experience the wonderful benefits of this medicine.

—The ways of a Board of Freeholders are not strewn with violets, judging from the growls from Plainfield, from Bound Brook and elsewhere, because they don't build bridges fast enough and because they build them too fast.

Queen Victoria has a remarkably fine head of hair, for a lady of her age; but her son, the Prince of Wales, is quite bald. Had he used Ayer's Hair Vigor earlier in life, his head might, today, have been as well covered as that of his royal mother. It's not too late yet.

IS YOUR BAKING POWDER PURE?

Do its Manufacturers Publish all the Ingredients Used?

IS IT FREE FROM AMMONIA?

As is well known, ammonia is unhealthful in food, and dries up the bread material.

Protection to consumers of food compounds lies in their ability to choose those made from healthful substances. Unless manufacturers publish just what their baking powder is made of, do not use their goods, but buy instead

Indigestion

Is not only a distressing complaint, of itself, but, by causing the blood to become depraved and the system enfeebled, is the parent of innumerable maladies. That Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best cure for Indigestion, even when complicated with Liver Complaint, is proved by the following testimony from Mrs. Joseph Lake, of Brockway Centre, Mich.:—

"Liver complaint and Indigestion made my life a burden and came near ending my existence. For more than four years I suffered untold agony, was reduced almost to a skeleton, and hardly had strength to drag myself about. All kinds of food distressed me, and only the most delicate could be digested at all. Within the time mentioned several physicians treated me without giving relief. Nothing that I took seemed to do any permanent good until I commenced the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which has produced wonderful results. Soon after commencing to take the Sarsaparilla I could see an improvement in my condition. My appetite began to return and with it came the ability to digest all the food taken, my strength improved each day, and after a few months of faithful attention to your directions, I found myself a well woman, able to attend to all household duties. The medicine has given me a new lease of life."

TWO TO ONE!

That's just what the average man finds that he requires, two pairs of pants to every suit. We know this to be so from the quantity of separate pants we sell. To meet this demand we always keep a stock of independent pants of every shade of color, of every variety of material and of every size. At the beginning of the season the stock is fullest, of course, and it is a good time in which to match up a portion of a suit. No matter whether you are long or short, thick or thin, nor what kind of a suit you want to match, you will find what you want right here. If you don't you certainly will not find it anywhere else.

Pants to work in; pants to wear to business; pants for Sunday or dress, and pants fit to be married in. What more need we say? Step in and match up the old suit and thus save the cost of a new one for a month or two. Poor advice for us to give, you think? That's so, perhaps, but we'll secure your gratitude and good-will now, and your money for a new suit will follow later.

FASHIONABLE FISHER MAIDS

How New York Girls Go Crabbing in the September Days.

When the Men Go Back to Town Then the Maids Have a Good Time—Picturesque Frolics in the Creeks and Inlets of Long Island Sound.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

The hill and dale is heard the merry crack of the huntsman's gun, and September, ushering in some of the manlier sports of the year, brings also to the girls a farewell season of fun and frolic which they heartily enjoy before deserting the seashore for the city. When lawn tennis and croquet grounds are neglected, and mountain hotels and boarding houses are desolate, the remnant of fashionable femininity which still clings to the solid seashore relaxes the strings of propriety to some extent and has a good time, regardless of Mrs. Grundy. It is only fair to say that they are ably abetted by the rearguard of the sterner sex, which, knowing the trout charms of September, delays its return to town accordingly.

Too cool for bathing, the water is delightful for fishing, and the innumerable little inlets and shallows at Bar Harbor, Atlantic City, and along the Long Island coast, offer unbounded facilities in this respect. Bevies of pretty girls are to be seen in all sorts of picturesque costumes, boating, fishing and crabbing in the placid waters and among the creeks of Sheepshead and Jamaica Bays. Occasionally an eel or a sea-bass falls to their lines, and then there is a paean of jubilation from the lucky anglers.

"Most everybody's gone home and now we can go fishing," said one brown-faced Miss to another, as they stood upon the board walk of a fashionable Long Island hotel yesterday. "I know a nice young man we can get to take us out in his centre-board, and we can sail up and down the inlet or go out to the bay and have lots of fun."

Ten minutes later, the pretty planner had the young man in tow. He was a slender sort of aquamarine automaton, and talked yachting between the puffs of his cigar as if he were a born sailor, instead of a young attorney on vacation. Within an hour, the centre-boarder was heaving and dipping in the swell of the bay, and the girls were getting well browned in the September sun and wind, as they stood, with hands steadily gloved and hats pulled over their fresh young faces, holding the lines on either side of the boat, which was anchored in fifteen feet of water.

I heard later that they had capital luck and returned with a mess fit to cook for breakfast for a small party. It is amusing to listen to girls when they begin to tell fish stories. There is nothing in the male vocabulary to compare with it for pure extravagance.

But the real fun is reserved for the crabbing parties. Have you ever crabbed? Well, if not, you have missed one of the most exquisite pleasures of the seashore in September. First of all, the girls divide themselves into two sections; one to get the nets and the bait, the other to provide the lunch. The latter is usually quite a substantial affair and fills a good-sized hamper, which is stowed away in the bottom of the boat. The bait may be clams or small crabs, made into a fine mess, and it is to be "chummed" or cast into the water by handfuls. Tight-fitting dresses are the rule. In a crabbing expedition of this sort men are usually tabooed, although, occasionally, under pressure, one may be tolerated, provided he promises to behave himself and stay in the boat and smoke, while the girls are wading up to their knees.

They were a merry party of five girls and, "for protection," the brother of one of the quintette was taken along. He was a capital sailor, and as they didn't want to blister their hands and intended to reserve their efforts for game, the girls consented to take him as ballast. Half an hour's easy sailing brought them to a spot where one of the girls declared there were "millions of shedders," for she had seen someone catching them there a week before.

Then began the preparations for action. The big brother barricaded himself, like a good-natured fellow, behind the hamper, with his cigar and newspaper. One by one the girls slipped overboard into the shallow where their white feet gleamed like satin on the surface of the hard, white sand. A shriek accompanied the dipping of each foot in the eighteen inches of water, for it hardly came up to the knee and did not even kiss the hem of the kilted gowns. Bait was thrown about promiscuously, and then nets came into play. A sudden swoop by one of the girls, and a cry of delight announced the first capture of the day.

"Oh, I've got a beauty," cried the lucky finder, as she swung her net around in the imminent danger of the others who all flocked about her. "Take care girls; he'll bite you."

"Ouch!" shrieked the four in chorus.

There was a loud shriek from the youngest of the party at this moment and she stumbled and would have fallen had not another girl caught her by the waist just in time.

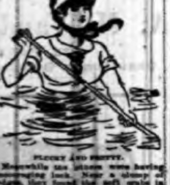
"Oh, something's bit me. I'm going in the boat. Oh, take me out!"

Tom peeped up from behind his barricade.

"What's the row?" he asked.

"It's a king-crab," said the rescuer, "and it has stuck in her foot. Maybe she had better get in."

The wounded, but not seriously hurt, fisher maiden, with the assistance of Tom's stout arm, got back into the boat and, after a brief examination, concluded she wasn't fatally injured. But she put on her shoes and stockings, nevertheless, and wanted no more wading.



PLUCKY AND PRETTY.

Meanwhile the others were having encouraging luck. Near a clump of sedges, they found the soft crabs in abundance, and soon the little baskets were well filled. [illegible] "See," said the cruel creature, "they must live till they're cooked, you know, else they wouldn't taste half so nice."

"Don't you wish you had stayed in the water?" asked the young man of the little Miss of the king crab incident.

"Well," she responded somewhat sadly, "I do hate to go back without having taken a single crab, and all the others have so many, too."

"I'll tell you what," suggested Tom, "I'll get out and trap a few for you, and you can claim their ownership, you know."

"Oh, no thanks. I do wish I had some, though. But I can't take off my shoes again. It serves me right for not having wading shoes, like the other girls."

Somehow a compromise must have been effected, for shortly afterward the others were surprised to see Tom step overboard and, carrying the young lady clear of the water, wade right into the centre of the group of fisher maidens. With his assistance she soon made a number of clever captures and had a fair share to her credit. She wielded the net so skilfully that her basket was quickly filled.

"Oh, what a monster," exclaimed the others, as she held up the net containing a squirming, wriggling crab.

The return home was a merry one, the lighthearted girls trolling out of song, while Tom smoked contentedly in the sheets. They forgave him for deserting his post long before the boat had tied up at the hotel wharf.

Crab-catching at night is a romantic affair, especially when it is followed by moonlight, with pretty girls handling the nets. Flatbottomed boats are used, and while one handles the oars, two or more girls ply the nets from bow to stern, on either side. Lanterns are hung out at each end of the boat, and to these the hard and soft crabs rise, attracted by the light. They are dazzled and incapable of seeing the net in the hands of the fisher, and in a twinkling they are scooped up and landed in the bottom of the boat. Among the guests at many of the hotels on the Long Island coast, crab-fishing is a favorite pastime and some of the ladies are so skilful that in an hour or two's netting they can supply enough delicious shedders to serve breakfast for the guests. But it is only in September that they exhibit their prowess; for, with all her jollity and "camaraderie," the American girl has a horror of offending the proprieties, and is sensitive of being criticised as a Tomboy, while playing the role of a fascinating fishermaiden, although next probably to ice cream, caramels and flirtation, there is nothing so dear to her heart as the shedders, cooked alive and redolent with the fragrance of the sea.

GOOD-BYES.

Something About the Various Kinds of Farewells.

Every now and then, as we journey through this vale from the cradle to the grave, it becomes necessary for us to say good-bye. Generally it is said in sadness and with a sigh. We wring the hand of the departing friend, the sorrowful tears are shed, then the bell rings and the train goes around the curve. This is the good-bye that sticks in the throat like a large three-cornered lump and persistently refuses to be swallowed. After this kind of a farewell we go home feeling that something has gone out of life. We are like the man who puts his foot for another step at the top of the dark stairway and finds suddenly that it isn't there.

Then there is the farewell that is said with a hilarious chuckle of joy. We say it to the bill-collector, whom we have with us always, or have had for a long time. We say it to the bore, the spring poet, to the man who reads the exchanges and to the writer who invariably refers to a bear as bruin.

We say it hurriedly and with a rising inflection to the book-agent, male and female. We say it to the man who tells us the funny story the nine hundred and forty-seventh time in one day. To the impecunious friend and to the man who is ever loaded with gratuitous advice. Very often we yearn for a chance to say it long before the opportunity is presented.

Distinctive are the good-byes of the dude, the giggling girl and the gibbering idiot. Deliver us from the long drawn out farewell of the female of our species, unless, perchance, the said female is young and fair.

The casual good-bye is used more generally, perhaps, than any other variety. It equals in significance the how-dye-do of our every-day life, and is about as useful as would be a hat-rack in Heaven.

A welcome good-bye is that of the man who pushes, with difficulty, the eighteen-carat odor of his breath in front of him, and who longs to confide in his friends; and in this same category may be listed the man who guzzles the red-hot demon, rum.

The sweetest good-bye is that of the girl at her father's front gate, when only you or I and the girl and twinkling stars are present. To some of us it is only a memory, this kind of a farewell, but it is a memory that will remain fresh and green long after we have passed that callow age.

The saddest good-bye is the one that is said by the side of an open grave.

RICHARD S. GRAVES.

AFTER MANY YEARS.

A Mean Deed That Cost Its Doer a Seat in the United States Senate.

Thirty years ago a little boy was given a quarter of a dollar for spending-money. As he was walking down street, very happy, he met with an older boy and showed him the money, saying as he did so: "See what my good papa gave me to spend." The older boy knocked it out of the little fellow's hand, snatched it up and ran away with it. The little boy was almost heartbroken, but when he went home crying and told about it, his mamma gave him another quarter. This mollified him, but he never forgave that older boy. The war came on, and the older boy was given a commission in the army, while the little one remained at home, because he was too young to enlist. After the war the younger boy became a clerk in the War Department. Within the past fifteen years, the older boy, who had become a lawyer and an orator, announced himself as a candidate for the United States Senate, and he had a large following.

It looked as though he might be elected. But one morning the newspapers of the country, especially of his own State, published a statement to the effect that the candidate had been dismissed from the army for cowardice and other questionable conduct. The lawyer denied the charge, and extracts from the muster rolls in the War Department were published, showing that the charge was true. He was not elected. After his defeat was accomplished he received a letter from Washington containing the words: "Do you remember the day you outraged a little boy's feelings, almost broke his heart, by stealing a quarter from him? That deed cost you a seat in the Senate." This true story might warrant the moral that honesty and gentlemanly conduct always pay better than rascality. Not only bread, but thistles, cast upon the water return after many days.

TOMMY'S EXPERIENCE.

It Did Not Prove as Satisfactory as He Had Anticipated.

Mrs. Judge Peterby, of Dallas, Tex., has a gifted son who is very much addicted to reading the newspapers, and adopting or putting into practice any hints or suggestions which he thinks are really valuable. He is particularly enthusiastic about hints in regard to health.

Just about the time the first green watermelons came into season, Mrs. Peterby on her return home from spending the day with a friend found her son Tommy sick, with two doctors taking it turn about with stomach pumps. She also noticed that her expensive geraniums and pot plants were gone. During one of the pauses in Tommy's indisposition she asked what had become of them.

"I read in the Journal of Health," gasped Tommy, feebly, while one of the doctors was screwing a new nozzle on his stomach pump, "I read that it isn't healthy to have plants in a sleeping room, so I sold 'em."

"What did you do with the money, you little wretch?"

"Bought watermelons," gurgled Tommy, as the doctor inserted the nozzle and began to dredge for more alluvial deposits.

Mrs. Peterby has spent some time, while Tommy has been convalescing, in trimming down one end of a hogshead stave, so that she can wield it with both hands on an emergency and Tommy.—Texas Siftings.

He Swallowed the Insult.

There is an Irish gentleman who drinks whisky. He was recently in Washington, and wanted an office. One day at noon he walked into the bar of the Riggs, ordered his beverage, filled the glass to the brim and then said to the bar-tender: "I'll take a little strap, if you please." The gentlemanly dispenser of refreshments said: "You have left no room in your glass for strap," and he looked hard at his customer. The Irish gentleman was equal to the emergency. He picked up the glass, and, as it moved towards his lips, he replied: "This is me first drink to-day, an' I'm thirsty. Therefore, [illegible]

The Wealth of Alaska.

The country is rich in minerals of various kinds and a great deal of money will be taken out of it during the [illegible]. The timber possibilities are also very promising. There is an abundance of spruce and cedar, both varieties attaining enormous size and important lumber value. In the matter of timber, Alaska does not differ materially from Washington Territory. The salmon fisheries are also very noticeable commercial factors, and operated, as they usually are, in conjunction with canning factories, they must naturally yield large profits to investors. American capital can, it is thought, be safely invested in Alaska with reasonable certainty of profitable returns.

TONY ON HIS TRAVELS.

A Dog That Passed Most of His Time on the Mail Cars.

There passed through Brattleboro, Vt., the other day a pretty little dog who has seen a good deal more of the world than most dogs of his age, writes a New York Times correspondent. His name is Tony, and those who ask whose little dog he is are informed that his master is the postmaster at Albany, N. Y. Tony is a Skye terrier, and is as pretty as he is intelligent, and curious about the world.

The mail clerks at the Albany post-office early conceived a liking for Tony, who for a morning constitutional used to walk with his master to the office. He liked them, too, and took great joy in watching them sort the mail and lock the bags. Soon he began to follow the mail wagons to the trains, and not long after he followed the bags into the mail car. One day he was found comfortably seated on the topmost bag; one of the clerks shared his dinner with him, and the dog rode on to Boston over the Boston & Albany. When the mail was taken out he betook himself to the baggage-room and waited for a train back, smuggling into the mail car again and again sharing lunch with the clerks. He rode back to Albany, but the next week was found in another mail car, and soon he began to spend most of his time "on the road." He did not always go to Boston. Sometimes he went to Springfield, and more often he tired of traveling and left at the smaller stations. He became known by all the clerks on the road, and lived in comparative luxury during his trips.

After leaving the car he always stayed around the station till a return train pulled in, and then made for the mail car if it had one. Sometimes he got off on a branch road, and then he would be gone for weeks before he would find his way back to the Boston & Albany line. On the present trip he had been gone three weeks. At Springfield he got on a Connecticut River train, and by the time he reached Brattleboro he had discovered his mistake and jumped after the mail when it was tossed from the car. He waited about the station all the morning, and then boarded a northern train and went to Bellows Falls; found there that he was still going away from home, and came back again. For two days he rode about on different trains, and then he fell in with a mail clerk who had known him on the Boston & Albany and who put him off at Palmer, gave him a good square meal and started him toward home.

The Pastor Won't Go.

Mrs. Pointe-Lace—"Really, Mrs. Dresser, our congregation is too poor to send our minister on a vacation this Summer. We've got to economize."

Mrs. Dresser—"So we have. The minister ought to take his vacation out of his own salary. By the way what did your husband pay for his last trotter?"

Mrs. P. L.—"Ten thousand, and the horse was cheap at that."

Mrs. D.—"So I think. We poor people must take care of ourselves. The Lord will look after the pastor."

Care of the Eyes.

Dr. Webster Fox in the journal of the Franklin Institute, maintains that the majority of blind people have lost their sight from want of proper care during infancy, and nurses or mothers who heedlessly expose an infant's eyes to the glare of the sun for hours may be laying the foundation of the most serious evils. He protests against permitting young children to use their eyes in study, and declares that the eye is not strong enough for school work until the age of seven to nine. Children should not be allowed to study much by artificial light before the age of ten, and books printed in small type should be absolutely prohibited in the school room.

Edgar Saltus doesn't believe in the Bible, it is said. This information is unnecessary, for his books give evidence that he only believes in my Saltus. It is true, nevertheless, that a good deal more Bible and a good deal less Saltus would improve greatly the literary pabulum that he provides for his readers.

A POET AND EDITOR ADRIFT.

What Sir Edwin Arnold Thinks of Yankees and Hindoos.

The Good Calls on the President—Their Conversation—Sir Edwin Sees the Sights, He Also Talks, and Then Proceeds Around the World.

COPYRIGHT 1889.

I AM generally, my wife often says, a good-natured man; but when you ask me for news of Washington in the month of September, why, then—well, I seek relief at the fountain of Helicon, which, if it fails to cheer, does not often inebriate.

The news? There's never news in this,
Our Summer holiday.
O! don't your correspondent miss
The Winter blithe and gay?
For Fashion drains her hemlock cup
In splendid disarray,
And stocks are down and blinds are up
When Congress is away!

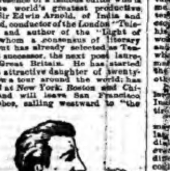
Anon our people eat and drink;
Anon the Leaguers play;
And in adjacent towns, I think,
The farmers ted their hay;
So call us fly and lively if
You don't care what you say,
But it does make a mighty diff.,
When Congress is away.

We miss the scrimmage on the floor
We miss the Senate fray;
We miss O'Neill's and Jones's oratorical display;
We miss—sometimes—without a doubt,
The wherewithal to pay,
For bills are in and cash is out
When Congress is away.

'Tis often foolish, but we would
It might forever stay,
And in a rather sombre mood
We count the months from May;
In pleasure weak and patience strong
Dispirited we stray,
With purses short and faces long
When Congress is away.

That's about the size of it.

But if there is not in Washington much of that ephemeral stuff which the gabbling telegraph delights to call "news," there is something better in the transient presence of a famous editor who is also the world's greatest productive poet—Sir Edwin Arnold, of India and England, conductor of the London "Telegraph" and author of the "Light of Asia," whom a consensus of literary judgment has already selected as Tennyson's successor, the next poet laureate of Great Britain. He has started with an attractive daughter of twenty-three on a tour around the world; has touched at New York, Boston and Chicago, and will leave San Francisco in October, sailing westward to "the East."



SIR EDWIN ARNOLD.

Last year Sir Edwin lost his second wife, an American lady whom he married in 1868 while she was sojourning with her mother, Mrs. Channing, in England.

It is an odd little story. During war times, '61 to '64, I attended the Unitarian church of Washington of which William Henry Channing, nephew of the great William Ellery, was pastor. He was also the Chaplain to Congress. It was known that his wife was a rigid Episcopalian, and it was understood among his friends that she had never heard him preach, and that she had gone to England to reside in order to have the children beyond the influence of his radical mysticism. At any rate she and the children remained in England, where he afterward joined them and where he died, and one of his sons became a member of Parliament, where he now sits, and the daughter fled from Episcopalian tenets and became the wife of Edwin Arnold, the Oriental "skeptic and Pagan."

Arnold's suggestions sent Smith to delve in Assyria and Stanley to fight and explore in Africa, and his fertile brain, in the intervals of exacting newspaper work, has turned out ten volumes of poems which have made an enduring mark upon the literature of this generation.

I gave myself the pleasure of a call upon Sir Edwin. He is a man of medium height and swarthy complexion, full black beard and hair, neatly trimmed, face strongly marked and eye alert and genial. His manner is cordiality itself. He is a rapid talker, and in his accents, especially in what an American may call the wheedling inflection: he is emphatically English. The daughter shows her mother's training, and, like a high-bred American girl, is self-poised and self-reliant without audacity and modest without constraint and diffidence. Like her father she is a good talker and a good listener. Of the call upon the President, Mr. Arnold said:

"It was a delightful thing to meet the potentate of this great people. He was charming. He was so good to my daughter. He took us to the room where Lincoln signed the emancipation proclamation, and where his great Cabinet meetings were held, and to that window where for years he sat looking down upon hostile Virginia. He did not remind me of that bold, bad Britisher who burnt the White House, once, but when I recalled to him the fact that the Boston Post Bill that caused the Revolution was passed in Parliament by only one majority, and that only that small accident divided us, the President said, 'No. We should have separated anyhow. There was too much feeling. And if we had stayed together America would have grown to be the bigger half, you see.' I thought it not polite under his own roof to remind him that Great Britain and her colonies now counted 380,000,000. They told me of a talk of a new Executive Mansion to be built back of the present structure. That is all well, but I earnestly hope the present White House will never be razed nor much altered. It is a part of the world's history."

"Did the President ask about the order you wore on your breast?"

"No. He looked at it inquiringly, but said nothing. It was the order of the Empress of India, which Her Majesty bestowed on me with her own hand, and I wore it to the White House as a token of high regard, much as a brave of your plains would deck himself in wampum and much red feathers. He is quite the equal of sovereigns while he sits there. In official communications they always address him as 'My Good Friend,' and he addresses them similarly, sometimes making it 'great and good.' They address each other as cousins and brothers."

"You have had many interviews with Monarchs and Princes. How do they differ from this with President Harrison?"

"A bit more stately and ceremonious; not otherwise different. I was at a reception in London in June, where the Prince of Wales was. He kept his seat most of the time, and when he wished to talk with anybody in[illegible] beckoned him to his side. [illegible] to me, and I had a very delightful talk, he, of course, leading up to the topics of conversation. But I assure you that the Prince is the most beloved of Englishmen. The talk of dissatisfaction is all nonsense."

"Is England never to outgrow a Monarchy?" I asked.

"Why should it? It is well and serenely and cheaply governed. Our Sovereign has less power than your President and her Cabinet is dissoluble at any time which yours isn't. No, I don't know as a Republican form of Government is necessarily the fate of Kingdoms. Rome was an Empire after it was a Republic; so was Venice; so was France, and will be again, by the way."

"But your people seem to find a Monarchy rather expensive."

"No; only a few extremists. As a matter of fact the entire expense of supporting all the royal family amounts only to seven and sixpence a head per year—less than $2 apiece for the people of Great Britain and Ireland. But after all,

'For forms of government let fools contest—
That which is best administered is best.
Of all the ills that human hearts endure,
How small the part that law can cause or cure?'"

"Has any Yankee had the cheek yet to ask you if you were a descendant of Benedict Arnold?" I ventured to inquire.

"No," he laughed, "but several have asked if I were a relative of Matthew Arnold."

"They ought to know better if they saw the unfriendly slash that he gave you about Paganizing England. Yet you wrote a eulogistic poem of him at his death."

"What he said of me was spoken in a moment of inadvertence. No matter. I mourn him sincerely and deeply. He had a brilliant and delicate genius. What an admirable picture is that of his in the Macedonian invasion:

'The East bowed low before the blast
In patient, deep disdain;
She let the legions thunder past,
Then plunged in thought again.'

So true of Asia! I could quote you his poems all night. I have never met anybody, not even himself, who knew so much of his poetry as I do."

"You have a remarkable memory?"

"Only in certain lines. It retains poetry very tenaciously. If I could get $1 apiece for the poems I know I could pretty nearly buy Washington. Yet my own verses sift through my brain as though a sieve. I cannot remember them at all."

"By the way," he presently resumed, "that interesting man, General Greely, has had the kindness to call and carry us about town and show us the sights. His own signal service is far ahead of ours—far ahead of any other nation—especially in the matter of delivery and distribution. Think of the half-past ten o'clock indications being in Chicago, New York and Boston in half an hour, and thousands of printed maps of them distributed before noon! Gen. Greely took me to the Capitol, a noble building with an elegant dome. He was inclined to apologize for the crudeness of some of the pictures in the rotunda. But that feature of them is not what chiefly struck me. The surrender of Cornwallis I contemplated thoughtfully, and I told my escort a story: A man showed a lion his paintings, and among them was a wounded lion evidently in great pain and nearby was the exulting hunter who had shot him. 'Very good,' remarked the lion, 'but if I had painted the picture I would have painted it otherwise.'"

Remembering that Sir Edwin was long president of the college in Poona, India, I asked him if Sanscrit was entirely a dead language.

"Yes, quite," he said. "Hindostani may perhaps be said to be the vernacular now, but there are 140 different dialects spoken in India. Nobody has ever learned them all and they are as different as English and Spanish. I could name a score of languages that our English people there have to talk."

"What is the state of native Hindoo literature?"

"There is hardly any, except that high education which the English have carried there. There are many natives who attain this, but they use English books, and become acquainted with Scott and Dickens and Buckle and Tennyson and Macaulay. But there is no creative native literature. Scholars live in the past. The Mohammedan is satisfied with the Koran, the Sikh with the Granth, his holy book, the Hindoo with his Vedas and Upanishads. If they want reading they get these read to them. Out of 1,000 not half a dozen can read and write. Natives produce in the vernacular nothing but little short stories."

"Is there a mine in old Hindoo literature which it will pay modern scholars to work?—in that great poem of mythology and cosmogony, the Mahabarata, for instance?"

"Yes, he said," if the mine is approached with love and sympathy. That vast book you have mentioned needs interpreting and sifting. It is as if somebody were to dump in front of your house a cartload of diamonds, and ten cartloads of gold, and four hundred cartloads of rubbish and dirt."

I ventured to ask the distinguished visitor if he would show me the jeweled decorations bestowed upon him by his Queen, and by the Oriental sovereigns. He graciously consented and asked Miss Arnold to set them out. "I have to cart them about," he added, "for they will help me onward. They will all be required during the journey."

The table sparkled royally when the orders were all spread out—gold and jewels wrought in artistic forms and hung from gorgeous ribbons.

Here was the great star of India, as big as the palm of one's hand, of solid silver and gold set in diamonds and bearing the motto "Heaven's Light Our Guide." This was given by the Queen in recognition of his poem "The Light of Asia."

Here was the order of the Medjidieh, presented to him by the Sultan in grateful recognition of his poem "Pearls of the Faith." On a boss of gold in the centre is the Sultan's cipher—a kind of monogram in Turkish letters. Around the edge is a repetition of the Mohammedan emblem, the star within the crescent.

Here was the order of the Osmanieh, received from the Khedive of Egypt. It contains a verse from the Koran in Turkish, set in beautiful enamel of red and green. Next and very unique comes the order of the White Elephant of Siam of which the Queen and himself are the only two English possessors. It bears the sacred White Elephant on the lotos flower, looking like a magnificent clover leaf. Around it is the inscription in Siamese "Om muni padme om!" ("O, the jewel of the lotos, O!") This came with a personal letter from the King.

Last and most rare is the order of the Lion and the Sun, from that "King of Kings," the Shah of Persia, as a token of approbation for the poem "Sa'di in the Garden."

I asked Sir Edwin how he liked American newspapers. "I tremendously admire their enterprise, vivacity, push and dash," he said, "and if they were more serious and dignified they would seem to me about perfect. But, like the lion, it all depends on the point of view. To say which is best, the audience must be considered."

HIS GLITTERING EYE.

The Snake Certainly Uses It to Charm Its Prey.

The bright, diabolical glitter of a snake's small, round optics does indeed possess a most inexplicable power over living objects upon which it is concentrated with mischievous intent, but, writes Dollie Henry in the St. Louis Republic, I am inclined to the opinion that it is never exerted except on things that serve to gratify the snake's appetite, such as small birds, frogs and insects. Birds are certainly victimized by this strange magnetism that seems to fill them with a desire to flee from danger, while it draws them right into the venomous jaws that terminate their little lives.

Years ago, when my brother and I were barefoot children, we were pursuing a narrow path through a wheat field in our daily quest of pleasure and watermelons. The path lay quite near the fence, and under the shade of a large tree that stood just outside of the field we noticed a cat-bird in a perfect agony of effort to rise and fly, but with its utmost exertions it could only get a foot or two up and fall back to the ground to flutter excitedly up again, and all the time it seemed to be irresistibly drawn to a spot [illegible] a deadly terror. We watched it a [illegible], and [illegible] assisting it seemed to spring simultaneously into our minds.

"Poor little bird, I'll [illegible] you a toss up, and then you can fly," said I, starting forward, for I thought its trouble was caused by a lack of strength.

"I'll free you, little bird," said my brother, as he jerked me back with a force that tore my dress and nearly upset me, but he said [illegible] and then he said the bird was charmed by a snake, and he would break the charm by going between them, which he did, and then found the snake—a rattler—and killed it.

One of nature's sweetest songsters, a mocking-bird, was frequently in a little cedar tree that stands out obliquely a few yards from the corner of my room, but its visits at this time of year are short, seldom more than half an hour's duration. One afternoon in the early part of June I noticed he stayed an unusually long time, and that he warbled in a wild, excited manner. An unbroken stream of melody issued from his little throat, and sounded for all the world as if he were afraid to stop; but I thought he was so delighted with his own music that he was carried away with it. I soon discovered the charm proceeded from a different source; for on going out into the yard and turning the corner of the house I saw a great black snake with its head reared fully ten inches and its keen gaze riveted on the mocking-bird. So intent was it in its diabolical design that it did not see me while I hunted a murderous weapon, and took deliberate aim, and missed it—then it made great haste to crawl away and the bird flew off in a twinkling.

SECRETS OF THE BLACK ART.

Some Amusing Features of a Magician's Life.

Prof. Herrmann Talks About His Business—How Some Astonishing Feats are Performed—Science Has Aided the Magician—Some Practical Jokes.

COPYRIGHTED.

It may be said that a magician like a poet is born and not made. Training and continual exercise will do a great deal, but unless there is something beyond and beneath, they will achieve nothing. I have noticed this time and again. There is not a prestidigitateur, amateur or professional, who is not overwhelmed with applications from men and women to be taught the mysteries of our art. In many cases they succeed in having their wishes granted and become what may be termed students in legerdemain. Although they work hard and long, they seldom or never get ahead and finally they drop out altogether, disappointed and sometimes heart-broken at their lack of success.

Of course there are many notable exceptions to the rule; Ernest S. Allien of New York, Harry Leslie, one of Frank Leslie's sons, Lewis N. Megargee, William Muirbek, the president of the Palma club in Jersey City, and a score of others have done some remarkably excellent work in almost every field of professional magic. In fact many amateurs have contributed odd discoveries and ingenious inventions to our art. The curious chemical compound, which when burned increases three hundred fold in bulk and which is familiar to the public in the form of "Pharaoh's Serpents' Eggs," was first applied to this purpose by an amateur who had studied the art of so-called "magic" under a number of professionals. Of similar origin are those powerful chemicals which change water to apparent blood, wine or ink, which enable a prestidigitateur to pour twenty different kinds of drinks from the same bottle and which alter the colors of flowers and fruits in almost any manner that may be desired.

So large has this field become of late years—what may be called the field of chemical conjuring—that it is possible for a well-educated man or woman without the slightest practical knowledge of magic to give a long and interesting performance in conjuring that in many respects will be superior to what is given by traveling fakirs. The demand for apparatus by amateurs who give such exhibitions in private parlors, and even before what may be called private audiences in the [illegible] resorts of the country, is so [illegible] that there are several business houses which do an immense trade in supplying these goods, supplying amateurs with magical outfits, the chief features of which are of an electrical, mechanical, chemical or scientific character. Good types of such apparatus are found in the "goblin drum," which is suspended by a fine wire from the ceiling, and which, at the word of the performer, beats, answers questions and does arithmetical work. Of the same kind is the "spirit clock" which is a dial of clear glass similarly suspended and whose hands seem to possess human intelligence. In either case the wire is double and serves to conduct a current of electricity from a concealed battery to a clock-work inside the drum or to the hands of the dial. The performer or his assistant sets the battery in action and by a button controls the movement of the clock-work. Some of these scientific illusions are both striking and beautiful. One which is rarely seen, although it is exceedingly simple, is the "Fountain of Light." A barrel or tank lined with a cheap mirror is filled with water and its contents brilliantly illuminated, either by means of a dark lantern which throws its light through a glass window on the side or by incandescent globes suspended in the water. If, when the room is very dark, the faucet be turned and the water allowed to run out and fall into a glass pitcher or bowl, the liquid that falls, and that which is caught below, seems fluid fire, so perfectly does it carry the light in its particles. A large volume might be filled with the description of these scientific experiments. They are seldom employed by professionals and even when used are intended as expedients to distract the attention of the audience and not for any particular merit of their own. It is on this account that all first-class magicians keep a sharp eye upon the development of the modern sciences and make use of each new idea before it has become the common property and knowledge of the public.

Magic has undergone great changes in my own recollection, most of which has been for the better. When I began my professional career (and I was only eight years of age at the time) the average conjurer carried with him enough apparatus and paraphernalia to fill a baggage-car. With this he dressed the stage until it looked like the exhibition room of a large jewelry house. It was a legend of the profession that the richer and more brilliant the equipment the greater the success of the performer. One magician carried with him what are known in the dramatic world as "properties," and also the materials for a set scene. He set his stage so as to resemble the interior of a Greek palace in the time of Pericles and went so far as to have his attendants attired in classical tunics.

Another popular performer of that period reproduced the den or laboratory of an alchemist, where strange fires burned, liquids boiled and mysterious vapors and perfumes ever and again broke upon the air. Still another played the part of a medieval necromancer or wizard and used as ornaments the death's head, owl, alligator and black cat with which that individual was popularly believed to be surrounded.

The modern style of performing in a dress suit with the stage set as a drawing room [illegible] believe with my father and Robert Houdin. It was well received by the public but was opposed by the profession. Their ideas slowly forged ahead until to-day they are almost universally followed. The old system died hard. While it is seldom seen now-a-days in the large cities, it is occasionally [illegible] in small towns. Much of the apparatus then used has gone into the curiosity shop, some into collections of bric-a-brac and some has been put to wiser and more practical uses. The rule at present is to use as little machinery as possible, and to conceal or disguise that little as much as can be done.

There are exceptions to these cases where scientific [illegible] are produced. The "Sphynx" or [illegible] Woman, where a head seemingly free of any body is suspended by [illegible], the [illegible] "Cabinet" where [illegible] apparently disappears without leaving a trace behind, and "Pepper's Ghost," where men walk through each other as if each were a [illegible] the largest and finest mirrors and other expensive optical apparatus.

Some of the superb scientific tricks have been borrowed from the conjuror's repertoire and used in opera and drama. In some of Wagner's compositions, in the "Corsican Brothers," and I am told in at least two of Henry Irving's wonderful productions, mirrors, reflectors and electrical appliances have been employed with more than satisfactory results.

The effect of these scientific toys is great enough upon educated people. With persons of less intelligence it is far greater while with those of no education it is simply terrific. In some parts of Europe and Asia I have at times risked life and limb from the superstitious and illiterate, who were convinced that I was in league with the devil. Every now and then you run across individuals who still believe in witches and wizards, in devils who go around disguised in human shape and in the ability of any man to sell his soul to the powers of darkness for almost any and every conceivable consideration. To such as these all legerdemain seems uncanny and every prestidigitateur a very suspicious, if not a dangerous character. When beyond this, they see something not only inexplicable but also incomprehensible that seems to involve power over spiritual beings good and bad, their superstition overcomes all curiosity and they become the slaves of fear in regard to the spectacle they witness and of hatred and ferocity toward the actor.

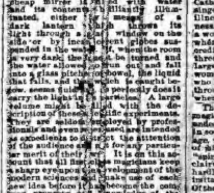
Only of late years has the talent of the prestidigitateur been recognized by society and the public. A successful professional does an amount of work and undergoes a training that is a marvel. To do a trick, and do it well, demands years of the hardest practice. Dexterity is acquired only by continual and ever repeated experiences. The musician who plays and replays his pieces for hours every day, and the engraver who spends a month upon a picture hardly an inch square, are the only ones who may be compared with the magician as to daily toil. For years I practiced ten hours a day before a mirror and even at the present moment devote some time every day to keeping my hand in good shape.

Nor is this all. A man to succeed in my vocation must study human nature and the art of conversation. The audience must be amused, startled and interested in order to be thoroughly mystified. The joke or epigram of to-day becomes stale to-morrow and must be replaced by something new. Beyond this he must keep up an intimate knowledge of chemistry, physics, electricity and mechanics. A great magician must be a well-trained, well-educated and well-read gentleman. There is hardly one I ever knew but what was such and was so treated the world over. In nearly every case he is feted at home and abroad and in those lands where such customs prevail he is the recipient of honors, stars, crosses and even titles.

There is a humorous side to the profession which is always pleasant. To keep in practice as well as for other reasons every professor is forever playing harmless jokes. The effect of these at times is indescribable. Once at the dinner table of a hotel there was a pompous individual who bored every one present by his loud voice and sublime egotism. I stood it a few minutes and then fixing my eyes and raised my coffee to my lips, I pretended to swallow cup as well as contents. He gasped as if he had been struck and so called the attention of all there to himself and myself. I then swallowed the saucer and knife. It was too much for his composure. He broke down, the crowd burst into a roar, and we were troubled no more at that meal.

On another occasion when a man who was too fond of whiskey to be of use to anybody else, insisted upon joining the group to which I was talking, I suddenly took my hat off and let a large rat fall on the table. The man yelled and made a bee line for the street.

More curious was the conduct of a countryman in whose pocket I found a large assortment of regulation articles. Instead of laughing he fell upon his knees and prayed to be delivered from the Evil One.



SCARING A DRUNKARD.

Magicians seldom play pranks on women, as their natural nervousness and sensibility may be too strongly affected. On the other hand these very qualities make them invaluable as assistants. They enter into the spirit of the thing and do far better work than my own sex. Occasionally they go even further and perform themselves in good fashion. Thus, for example, Mlle. Catherine, a finished and cultured opera singer, who had lost her voice through illness, took up legerdemain as a business. Within one year she had gained a wonderful skill and dexterity and when I last saw her was doing far more creditable work than two men out of three in the same line. There is a large number of French and German women who are similarly occupied and who have made themselves very popular through their aptitude in every city where they have appeared.

There is another phrase of modern magic which is worthy of note. In the endeavor to keep pace with the changes in society produced by the spirit of the age, the conjurer has added to the list of his accomplishments the so-called "spiritualistic" powers of mediums, clairvoyants and clairaudients. It is hardly needful for me to state that the imitators do better than the originals. Of the numberless tricks and subterfuges adopted by the dishonest to extract money from the pockets of the credulous, every one has been done so much better by prestidigitateurs as to ruin the original business. The "cabinet" of the Davenport Brothers, the sealed tent of the Eddys, the blood-red writing on the arm of Colchester, the reading of letters in gummed envelopes by Flint, the slate-writing of Slade, the levitation of Home and Foster, and last but not least, the "spirit pictures" of Mme. Dis Debar have been outdone repeatedly by members of our vocation. In this work I think we are entitled to great praise from all believers in truth and honesty. The public medium has through our efforts been driven from the stage and platform and now confines his efforts to private seances from which are excluded all but the confiding few who take stock in his manifestations. Our "second-sight" business, which was started by Robert Houdin, has been so systematized as to become a fine art. If nothing else, it has called attention to the vast possibilities of the mind and memory and given new ideas to the pedagogue and college director.

A Mighty Sociable Snake.

All the people of Jackson, Mich., are not liars, and one of the most truthful writes in the Saturday Star about a snake which he caught in Whitmore lake while fishing through the ice last winter. The reptile was very large and beautifully colored, and when the hook was removed from its mouth coiled itself and sprang fifty feet into the air several times. It then sat down on a chunk of ice and took lunch with the Jackson man, and after smoking a mild cigar slipped back into the water. This summer it came to the Jackson man's house as a star boarder, and it saves his little girl from drowning every time she falls into the water, [illegible] out of the barrel with its forked tongue and keeps the lawn sprinkled by filling up on water and spouting it over the yard, although it acted a little diffident about the last job until the Jackson man removed his keep-off-the-grass sign.

A LAWYER'S FORTUNE.

The Most Valuable Barrel of Whisky Ever Distilled.

A Young Attorney's Tramp Client and How the Latter Kept His Promise—A Small Fee That Developed Into a Million Dollars Cash.

"Undoubtedly the most valuable barrel of whisky ever distilled," said a well-known Steuben County lawyer to a New York Sun reporter, "was owned some years ago in Steuben County. If there was ever a barrel of whisky more valuable I would like to hear of it, for two gallons of this particular barrel brought its owner over $500,000 a gallon. There is a story connected with that whisky that is worth telling, and worth placing on the record, too.

"Some years before the war a young man named Henry M. Sherwood was admitted to the bar of Steuben County. He was a bright young fellow and belonged in the town of Woodhull. Soon after he was admitted to the bar, and before he had had his first client, a tramp was arrested and put in jail at Corning. He had been guilty of some serious breach of the peace, and his general appearance was that of a genuine tough. He tried to engage a lawyer to defend him when his case came up for a hearing, but as he had no money no one cared to take his case in hand. At last he inquired whether there wasn't some young lawyer in the place who hadn't had much of an opportunity to distinguish himself as yet, and who would likely be willing to undertake the management of the prisoner's case for the chance of getting some glory out of it. He was told that young Hank Sherwood might consent to appear under those conditions, and the stranger sent for the briefless lawyer. Sherwood went to the jail and saw the prisoner.

"'It looks as if I was in a pretty bad scrape,' said the tramp to Hank, 'but I believe that a lawyer can get me through all right. Now, I'm from Kentucky, and I haven't got a cent. I'm going back to Kentucky if I get out of this scrape, but I'll have to beg or beat my way till I get there. My father is a big distiller, but I've been a trifle wild, and he and I are not on the best of terms. He wouldn't send me a cent, even if I should send word to him of the fix I am in here. But I'll tell you what I'll do. If you will take charge of my case and work it for all it's worth and get me clear I'll sneak out of the old man's stock when I get home a barrel of the best old Kentucky whisky there is in the Bourbon country and have it shipped to you. I can do it easy. What do you say?'

"Young Sherwood didn't take a bit of stock in the tramp's story, but he made up his mind to see what he could do in the management of the case, just to begin getting his hand in, and he accepted the tramp as his client. I don't remember the details of the case, but Hank succeeded in clearing the tramp, and the latter went away, feeling good. Time passed along, and Sherwood had forgotten all about his tramp client and the proposed fee, when one day the station agent at Addison, where the young lawyer lived, met him and said:

"'Say, Hank, there's a barrel in the freight house for you. It's been there a day or two, and came from Kentucky. More than that, the markings declare that it contains fine old Kentucky bourbon.'

"The tramp had paid his lawyer's fee, sure enough. Sherwood had the barrel taken home and placed in his cellar. He wasn't much of a consumer with whisky, and the barrel lay in the cellar five years without being disturbed. The late Constant Cook was then Judge of Steuben County. He was holding court at Corning one term, and, as was the custom in those days, a number of lawyers and others gathered in the judge's room at the hotel in the evening and passed an hour or so in a social game of euchre. The judge enjoyed an occasional glass of good whisky, and he was a thorough judge of good whisky, too. On the occasion I speak of Hank Sherwood was one of the judge's euchre party. The judge was very bitter in his denunciation of the whisky they sold in Corning, and said he would be grateful for a glass of whisky that was fit to drink. That reminded Sherwood of his barrel of old Kentucky bourbon that had been lying so long in his cellar. He told Judge Cook that he had some whisky at home that he believed was good, and that he would fetch some down next day. He had his barrel tapped that night, and filling a two-gallon jug from it brought it to Corning and presented it to Judge Cook. The Judge tasted the whisky, and in all his experience had never met with its equal.

"'Young man,' said he to Sherwood, 'I won't forget you for fetching me this rare stuff. If ever I see a chance to give you a lift I'll do it.'

"Time passed. Sherwood skinned along after the manner of the average country lawyer. The war broke out. Judge Cook was one of the solid men of Western New York. He, in company with the late John Arnot, J. S. T. Stranahan, of Buffalo; Charles Cook, of Havana, and John R. [illegible], of Auburn, had built the New York and Erie railroad from Binghamton to Corning, and was largely interested in other great improvements in this part of the State of Pennsylvania. Soon after the war began he obtained a big Government contract, and at once sent for Hank Sherwood.

"'I'm going to give you that lift now, Henry,' said he.

"He let Sherwood in on the contract, and the country lawyer's share of the proceeds was $150,000—cold, cash dollars. After this was done Judge Cook said to Sherwood:

"'There's some land for sale in Tioga County, Pa. It's coal land, and is bound to be very valuable. You can buy some of it cheap. Put all the money you've got in that land.'

"Sherwood did so. Every dollar he made in the big contract he put into Tioga County land. He hadn't a great while to wait before the prophecy of Judge Cook came true. Henry M. Sherwood's first fee resulted in being the biggest fee ever received by any lawyer on earth, for he cleared over $1,000,000 from his investments in the Tioga County lands, and the barrel of Kentucky whisky his tramp client had paid for his services was the basis of it all. Was there ever a more valuable barrel of whisky distilled, do you think?"

NEVER FEELS COLD.

Silas Litchfield, the Strange Frost-Proof Man and Samson.

Humanity's manifold freaks are dwarfed by the appearance of a man insensible to the difference of heat and cold. His name is Silas C. Litchfield, and for thirty-five years he has lived in a temperature averaging thirty-six degrees above zero. In all these years Mr. Litchfield has had seven days' vacation. The rest of the time has been spent in a subterranean refrigerator.

This frost-proof being, says the New York Graphic, lives in Boston, Mass., and is employed by Mr. R. H. Leonard, of Quincy market, stall No. 50. Mr. Litchfield, the frost-proof man, has the reputation of being one of the strongest men physically that was ever known around the markets. In discussing himself Mr. Litchfield said:

"My name is Silas C. Litchfield. I am sixty years old. For thirty-five years I have worked in this cellar, during which time I have had only seven days' vacation, and during the last twenty-six years only one day off, when I attended the firemen's muster last year. In my early days I was supposed to be the strongest man physically hereabouts, and carried the largest ox and hog that ever came into the market. I am the only man who has ever been known to take a barrel of beef weighing four hundred pounds, walk upstairs and deliver it across the street. I have cooped ten barrels in less than eleven minutes right in here. I come to work every morning at 3:30, and continue to cut beef, with about two hours out of the refrigerator for meals, until five o'clock in the afternoon.

"How do I like it? Why, I would rather be in there on a hot day than outside sweltering. I'm acclimated, and think no more of coming in here to work than you do of going into your office. Ain't I ever sick? Why, bless you, I've never been sick a day in my life, and never have a pain or ache. I can either go into the cellar or come out with impunity, and never feel the slightest difference in the two extremes.

"I go from an atmosphere of one hundred degrees into my thirty-six degree cellar, and don't feel any different from going from one room of your house to another. In fact, I've got no feelin' as far as hot and cold is concerned."

Mr. Litchfield speaks in the highest terms of his employers, and said that at one time he [illegible] the strongest [illegible] in the refrigerator.

DEMOCRATIC TICKET.
FOR GOVERNOR,
LEON ABBETT,
OF HUDSON.

A [illegible] ISSUE.

There is a question now engaging public thought throughout the United States which is destined to grow in popular favor and assert authority, regardless of all political clap-trap and the [illegible] efforts of monopolistic greed.

The more that question is investigated in the clear light of truth, stronger will become the conviction that its triumph is allied to practical utility and the very best interests of the people, not the specially subsidized few, but the toiling and honest striving many.

The absurd doctrine that the merciless heaping of unjust taxation upon a man's industry, home and family is a guarantee of his worldly prosperity, is fast being exploded.

Popular intelligence may be slow in traveling through the slime of party politics, but when it does reach the solid rock of truth, and sees and understands things as they really are, political humbug will surely be unhorsed.

It is steadily moving in that direction. Tariff Reform is the living issue.

Even in Massachusetts, whose partisan loyalty to our present war-framed revenue system, artfully miscalled protection, has been so earnestly maintained, the spirit of tariff reform is crying aloud with no uncertain sound, and enlisting on its behalf the active exertions of men who have long been prominent leaders in the Republican party.

A like demand for reform and justice prevails Westward. From the recent utterances of a distinguished Western public speaker, not a Democrat, we make the following extracts:

"Our whole tariff system is wrong in principle, because it imposes its burdens upon what we consume instead of upon what we possess, thus compelling the poor day laborer to carry as great a financial load on the necessities of life as is carried by the man who is worth his millions."

"All financial burdens placed by our Government upon the people should be measured, not by their capacity to consume, but by their ability to pay."

"I would restore to the people what I believe to be a God-given right; that is, to trade anywhere in this wide world where they can buy the cheapest without being compelled, as they now are, to pay tribute to a favored few."

"If our industries need protection, let it be given on such a basis as would be honest and just—a protection that would protect the poor and do no injustice to the rich."

"Our industries are no longer in their infancy—to be nursed like a sick kitten at a hot jamb, and fed on catnip tea for all time to come."

"Out West it takes 30 pounds of the farmer's oats to buy 1½ pounds of trust sugar."

"The politicians' cry of protection, under our present system, has fooled the people for the last time."

"Every honest man is willing that all legitimate industries should be protected, but let the protection be fair and just."

"Give the poor people a fair chance, and we will have fewer strikes and riots and less starvation."

"An equalization of the opportunities of mankind to make a living, is what is right, but just what our present system prevents."

These extracts speak the unvarnished truth and reveal the drift of popular sentiment.

(From the Elizabeth Journal.)

"There are several Democrats in Plainfield," says the Times of that city, "who think their party has had all it can stand of Leon Abbett. They want a new deal with Leon left out." There are some in Elizabeth too. When they all "get together" next November there will be enough of them to elect Gen. Grubb, if the Republicans get out their vote.

The Central's Oyster Trade.

A noticeable feature of traffic on the Central Railroad of New Jersey at this season of the year is the oyster trains. Heavy trains from Port Norris and Long Branch, on the Southern Division, Cumberland and Maurice River branch, run into Jersey City every day, sometimes in two or three sections. In the early hours of the morning the wharves along West street, New York, are a busy sight. All the cars are flooded over and the dealers and hucksters soon empty them. The company also sends a train every day to Scranton and Wilkesbarre.

Not a word for the soldiers in Leon Abbett's long letter of acceptance.—Trenton [illegible].

Are "the soldiers" an issue in this campaign? Isn't this "a canvass of local and State policy only?" Suppose Gov. Abbett had gone out of his way to say a good word for the veterans, would you have been any better pleased? Would you not, on the other hand, have denounced him for "playing the old soldier racket?" Listen to your Republican neighbor, the Burlington Enterprise:

Leon Abbett is now trying to curry favor with the old soldiers of New Jersey.

He is "damn'd if he do and damn'd if he don't." Spell [illegible] backwards.

We! We!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—In your issue of Saturday there is a broad and sensible proposition from "A Republican" and a promise from you that "We do! We do!"

The best thing the people of Plainfield can possibly do is to nominate a Citizens' Ticket, to be voted for and elected, (as it surely would be), at the next municipal election in December, from Mayor to the last office on the ticket. What we want, as your correspondent so truthfully says, is a Common Council of practical, energetic, business men, who know how to run our city government economically, which now seems not to be considered at all; and men who know what the wants and necessities of the people at large, are. Men who will not think that spending the people's money vastly in [illegible] enterprise, and who will not consider that the rum question is the paramount one in our town.

We want neither tools of the saloon, nor dupes of designing men to rule over us. We have had enough of that sort of government. Those points to the wind in our city affairs and elect the right kind of men to serve us, is the motto of

ANOTHER REPUBLICAN.

Finances of the Fair.

At the meeting of the State Agricultural Society, which was held on Thursday afternoon, it was estimated that the proceeds of the late fair did not come within [illegible] of paying the expenses. More than that amount, however, was expended in improvements, and the society congratulates itself on escaping as well as it did, considering the bad weather. The regular quarterly meeting of the society will be held on the 16th inst., at which more full reports of the affair will be made.

Advocates of the electric motor for railways cannot extract much comfort from the report made by a Baltimore company which has tried the electric system for three years, and has now abandoned it because it proves far more expensive to operate than a horse railroad. The fault, however, must be in the method of application, not in the agent employed. Electricity seems destined to be more and more used, and it is fair to presume that more economical methods of applying it to the various purposes to which it is adapted will be devised. It has active competitors now, but some day it will lead them all.—N. Y. Tribune.

The Spread of Woman's Influence.

The Dunellen W. C. T. U., with their friends, enjoyed a Parlor Meeting at the [illegible] home of Mrs. Runyon, one of their members, recently, to which some of the Plainfield ladies had also received a cordial invitation.

The story of the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—to many so well known—proved to some new, and very interesting, and the results will no doubt be both helpful and encouraging to those who are already at work in Dunellen.

Refreshments were served at the close of the meeting, and many wishes were expressed that more opportunities might be given to hear and know about the different branches of the work.

Roselle Wins the Pennant.

Although two matches still remain to be played, the championship tourney of the Central Lawn Tennis League has virtually been decided, and the pennant will hang from the quarters of the Roselle Lawn Tennis Club. The unplayed matches are between the Roselle Club's team and that of the West End Lawn Tennis Club of Elizabeth on the latter's courts, and the El Mora Tennis Club's team and that of the Westfield Lawn Tennis Club on the former's courts. The record of this season's matches is as follows:

LOUIS DE CASTRO'S TERRIBLE FATE.

An Eighteen Year Old Lad Dies by His Own Hand—[illegible]—A Missing Letter to His Mother.

On Saturday night Scotch Plains was startled by the report that Louis de Castro, the young West Indian, had shot himself. It was found to be true, and the facts in the case are these:

About nine o'clock Bennet Brittin, with whom Louis lived, and his grandfather, was going through the front hall of his house, when he heard the muffled report of a pistol. Feeling alarmed, he went up stairs and into Louis' room, where an awful sight met his eyes. In a chair between the bureau and the bed, Louis was swaying back and forth and groaning. From a hole in his right temple blood was flowing profusely, and in his right hand which was half concealed beneath him, he held a discharged revolver. Horrified at the sight Mr. Brittin ran down stairs and told the men who were there to come up with him. Mr. Joseph Clark immediately went for Dr. Westcott. He was not at home, and Dr. Oliver was then called upon. Dr. Oliver saw at once that nothing could be done. The news spread abroad and a crowd soon collected. Louis seemed to be unconscious and continued to sway back and forth in his chair; he lived until 10:45 P. M.

Mr. Joseph Clark gave a Press reporter the following account: "It was about nine o'clock, and Judge Nicholl and I were sitting in Mr. Brittin's back room. We have a euchre club there and were about to play; Mr. Brittin had gone out to get the table. Suddenly we heard a pistol shot; it seemed to come from a distance. We heard Mr. Brittin turn and go upstairs and in another minute he rushed into the room where we were, his face like a death's-head, and told us to come up stairs quick. He took us to Louis' room, and there sat the boy dressed to go out. His eyes were glazing, and we heard the death rattle in his throat. There was no lamp in his room, but the moonlight poured in through the window and illumined the ghastly features of the dying boy. I went after Dr. Westcott, but he was at Fanwood. Then I obtained a horse and rode to Dr. Oliver's who came up on his tricycle. Dr. Westcott afterwards arrived, but of course nothing could be done."

It appears that Louis had been given to fooling with firearms and was careless in using them. Only a few weeks ago he had shot himself in the hand, and Mr. Brittin had taken the pistol away from him. The weapon used on Saturday was obtained surreptitiously.

It is impossible to believe without further evidence that the killing was the deliberate result of a sane mind. He had always seemed perfectly happy, having a sunny disposition, and he had nothing to worry him. He had a good home with his grandfather, and was earning four dollars a week while learning his trade. He worked for Robert [illegible], the plumber and tinsmith. He was about eighteen years old. He lived at Scotch Plains ten or twelve years ago and then returned to the West Indies to stay with his parents. About three years ago he came back to this country, where he has since remained.

The only clue to the boy's motive for the deed is in a letter which he is supposed to have written to his mother. He had asked the hostler if he would mail a letter for him which he was then about to write. He was seen entering the front door with a letter or envelope in his hand and this is as far as the letter can be traced. There is no sign of it in the room or about the house, and the hostler informed the Press reporter that the letter had not been given him to mail. It [illegible]. It is thought that if the shooting was premeditated he would have mentioned his intention to his mother, but if the letter remains unfound the circumstances of Louis' death must ever remain a sad impenetrable and [illegible] mystery.

Mr. and Mrs. Brittin are completely prostrated, and have the sincere sympathy of all their townsmen in this awful event.

The annual meeting of the Relief Association for the election of officers, was held in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association on Monday morning.

Rahway's Water Bonds.

The Rahway Savings Bank held $190,000 of Rahway water bonds when the city became bankrupt. The failure of the city brought ruin to the bank, and its affairs have been winding up under the supervision of the Chancellor. The city authorities made a proposition to replace the dishonored bonds with new 4 per cent. bonds for the principal and 35 per cent. of the unpaid interest in cash. The Chancellor was willing to make the compromise, provided the old bonds which were a lien on the city's water works, were left as security for the new. The city would not agree to that. Recently the City Attorney notified the Court that he had found capitalists to take the new bonds at eighty cents on the dollar, and if the Chancellor would authorize the reissue the city would pay the eighty per cent. and thirty-five per cent. in cash. The Chancellor told the Attorney that he would think about that when the capitalists are produced.

Plainfield Architects and Builders in Patchogue.

The Argus of Patchogue, L. I., publishes a picture of a new Methodist church in that village, which is almost an exact reproduction of Dr. Ketcham's new church on East Front street. Plainfield's good taste and ability is further shown to be appreciated in Patchogue, by the facts that the building is from the plans of a Plainfield architect and Plainfield mechanics are constructing it.

The Argus says: "A contract was soon made with Isaac W. Pangborn, of Plainfield, N. J., to erect the edifice according to plans and specifications prepared and drawn by Oscar S. Teale, architect of 247 Broadway, New York. Mr. Teale has shown himself master of his profession in the perfections of the plans, which are now being strictly followed by the builders. S. W. Milligan, of Plainfield, N. J., is superintendent of the mason work, and M. L. Connolly, of the same city, is foreman of the carpenter work."

For Damaging the "Villa Sans Souci."

The New York Tribune published the following article Wednesday:

"G. Warren Watson, a member of the Common Council of Plainfield, N. J., is being sued by Mrs. George Lisignolo, the wife of the New York broker, for damages done to the Villa Sans Souci, a pretty cottage adjoining the home of John Taylor Johnston, the ex-president of the Central Railroad of New Jersey. Coudert Brothers, the New York lawyers, are pushing the claims of Mrs. Lisignolo, who says that Councilman Watson and his family destroyed a great deal of property while living in the villa, which Mr. Watson rented furnished. Councilman Watson is a Democrat, and used this house, Mrs. Lisignolo says, as a sort of headquarters for political purposes. He or his [illegible] companions maliciously slashed valuable oil paintings, destroyed the furniture, and ill-used the horses and live stock, it is charged. Corporation Counsel Craig A. Marsh will defend Mr. Watson. The case will be brought into the Union County Court at Elizabeth next week."

Mr. Watson denies the charges and is considering whether to bring an action for libel for the alleged malicious publication of the article.

A Step in the Right Direction.

The managers of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad fully realize the fact, that in order to secure the patronage of the traveling public, it is essential to provide proper accommodations. This Company has, for the past few years, been constantly improving its property. It has practically relaid miles and miles of track with the heaviest steel rails on a good substantial roadway. Many new cars have been built and added to the service, and the Reading Company can now be justly proud of the comfortable and even luxurious accommodations which it furnishes its patrons. Another important feature that deserves mention is the shortening of the time of many trains. Minutes have been lopped off here and there, thus quickening the time very considerably.

New and handsome stations have been constructed at many points along the line and contracts for others have been awarded. The bridges on its system have been strengthened, and the service improved generally.

The Reading Railroad cannot now be surpassed for smoothness of roadway, magnificence of equipment, and speediness of train service.

Who Is to Blame?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—At a meeting of the Legal Voters of School District No. 14, of Scotch Plains, N. J., held on June 3d, 1889, the School Trustees were authorized to expend $18,000 in the erection of a brick school building for the District. After many delays the Board of Trustees decided to accept the plans furnished by McKim, Mead & White, of New York City, and about the 10th of September the contract was awarded. All that there is to show toward the "Elaborated Edifice" is a cellar partly excavated, and a pile of trap rock rubbish for the foundation walls.

At the time that the voters voted to raise the appropriation for the new school building, it was presumed that the building would be commenced in time to have it up and completed before the arrival of "Jack Frost," and ready for school purposes by the 1st of January, 1890. But the prospects now are that the Scotch Plains people will have to send their children during the coming Winter to the death trap of a school house, (so acknowledged in the report of the Trustees at the annual school meeting, held March last, and was their principal plea for a new school building.) These people are now becoming justly indignant and incensed at the slow progress of the men in whom they placed the utmost confidence by voting for everything they asked for at the school meeting, by over 100 majority.

DUTRA.

The Tramp Nuisance.

As the cold weather approaches, tramps are flocking into the city from the surrounding country. This city at the present time has its share of tramps, and many of them are of the most dangerous character. Scarcely a day passes but what some wandering brute will apply at a house, particularly in the suburbs, and demand something to eat, and if it is not given to him, he will become insolent and abusive. The tramp nuisance should be abated.

Did Amos Grow Up on Three Cent Shad?

In the trial of the suit of the City of Elizabeth to regain possession of the public dock property, foot of Elizabeth avenue, still in progress before Judge Van Syckel, Amos Moffett of this city, yesterday testified that in his boyhood he frequently drove with his father from Plainfield to Elizabethtown point and bought shad there. Shad were sold at $3 per one hundred. It was a public road to the water's edge.

We Do! We Do!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS: I hope you will advocate in our coming city election a "Citizens' Ticket," and you will find a number of Republicans that will vote it, providing said ticket is composed of practical business men of the city, who will legislate at least abreast of the demands of our city. We need sewerage and water, and need them badly; and need our commonwealth to be run on a more economical basis.

A REPUBLICAN.

Colonel Thomas for Quartermaster General.

There seems to be quite a contest over the vacant Quartermaster Generalship of the State, and amongst the prominent candidates named are Gen. Stockton; Col. Moore, late Postmaster at Trenton; Col. Donnelly of the 7th Regt., and Colonel Thomas, of the Governor's staff.

Colonels Donnelly and Thomas are both veterans of the late War, and members of the Grand Army. Col. Thomas, it is understood, is supported by many of the leading officers of the New Jersey National Guard, among whom he has many warm friends. Gen. Plume, the Major General of the Guard, and Gen. Steele, commanding the 1st Brigade, are strong associates of his, and it is to be hoped that the Governor will give him the vacant position, as he is a courteous, refined officer, and a gentleman.

He has large business experience, and is in every way fitted for the position. His appointment would be sure to give satisfaction to the National Guard, whose wants he understands better than any of the candidates so far named, and would be a credit to the State. Col. Thomas is a life-long Democrat, and an ardent supporter of Leon Abbett for Governor.

BOROUGH COUNCIL MEETING.

At 8:20 o'clock Friday night, Mayor Cooley rapped the Borough Councilmen in order, in regular session. Besides him there were present Messrs Buckle, Bettman, Emmons and Smalley. The minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved, and the usual routine of business was taken up, by the presentation of petitions and communications as follows:

From property owners on Summit avenue, asking for an enforcement of the sidewalk ordinance on that thoroughfare. Referred to the Street Committee.

From Warren Engine Co., No. 1, stating that H. A. Voehl had been duly elected a member of said company. Referred to the Fire, Water and Lamps Committee.

From Chief H. J. Martin, relating instance of recent fire at Peter Strong's residence in "Bull Frog City;" also calling attention to the inadequate supply of water and hose. The chief also reported the necessity for procuring lanterns, and stated that at a regular meeting of the company, the Mayor had sworn in twelve members. The report was filed.

Sundry applications for peddlers' and cartmen's licenses were sent in, referred and granted.

Claims were presented as follows: S. G. Taynor, $6; Thos. MacDonald, 5; S. G. Taynor, 3.25; L. Conrad, 9.30; N. Y., and N. J., Globe Gas Light Co., 269.36; Times Printing and Publishing Co., 5.80; Julius Stahl, 1; H. J. Martin, 50; M. Estil, 2.36; J. H. VanFleet, 2; Wm. N. Pangborn, 13; Jas. K. Arnold, 75; Thos. MacDonald, 37.50.

The above bills were referred for certification, and subsequently ordered paid.

Mr. Bettman, from the Laws and Ordinance Committee, submitted an amendment to the peace and good morals ordinance, relative to obstructing the streets and sidewalks. It was read by its title, and at a later stage in the proceedings the ordinance was put on its second reading, and laid over for thirty days under the rules.

The Street Committee, through its chairman, Mr. Smalley, reported finishing the scraping of the streets, West of Grove street; he also reported a balance of $86 in the road account. Needed work, he said, was on Green Brook road, Somerset street, Grove street and Clinton avenue. Several crosswalks are yet to be laid.

Mr. Bettman took occasion to say that the street commissioner, acting under instructions from the chairman of the Street Committee, had dug out dirt from in front of his premises on Willow avenue, and had used the dirt for personal gain. He said that a part of the grading there, the expense of which he bore himself, had been dug out, so as to leave a receptacle for water in the gutter.

Street Commissioner Conover replied to Councilman Bettman in terms not altogether complimentary, after which the acceptance of the Street Committee's report was put to a vote. It was received and filed, Mr. Bettman voting "No."

Mr. Buckle, from the Fire, Water and Lamps Committee, stated that the committee had met the night before and looked over the by-laws of Warren Engine Co., No. 1. The committee, he said, recommended their adoption, with a few exceptions. Progress was reported from another member of the same committee.

Mr. Bettman offered a resolution to the effect that the Street Committee relay a certain crosswalk on Orchard place. After another spirited discussion the resolution was lost.

A resolution by Mr. Smalley authorizing the Street Committee to make repairs on Clinton avenue, Somerset street, and in other localities named in the Committee's report, was adopted, the cost not to exceed $100.

At this juncture Mr. Bettman raised a good point, but he was voted down. He said that it was unwise to appropriate more money than the Street Committee had at its disposal, which is about $86.

Mr. Buckle made a motion to the effect that Mr. J. VanDeventer be given the privilege to macadamize Clinton avenue, and that the cost for the same be deducted from Mr. VanDeventer's taxes. Corporation Counsel Reed, who was present, said the proceedings would not be legal, and the matter was dropped.

Mr. Buckle offered a resolution which prevailed, authorizing the street commissioner to notify the property owners along Summit avenue to lay walks in front of their residences.

A resolution, offered by Mr. Smalley, instructing the street commissioner to notify those who are unnecessarily obstructing the streets to desist, was adopted.

The Council then adjourned, and the reporters, whose tables had been in use down stairs, sought the station stove, to thaw out.

Justice Nash Retaliates.

At the Council meeting on Monday evening a communication was received from Mr. C. A. Hunter, with reference to certain property on Eighth street, which Mr. Hunter said had been advertised for sale for taxes, and stating that the taxes had been paid, and receipts could be produced for the same.

In answer to the communication Justice V. W. Nash, the delinquent tax collector, publishes the following.

OPEN LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PRESS:—The tax upon the property on Eighth street, advertised among the delinquent taxes of 1888, was not paid until ten days after the date of Mr. Hunter's communication to the Common Council. It was then paid to Mr. Johnson by Mr. Hunter.

V. W. NASH,
Delinquent Coll'r.

CITY COUNCIL MEETING.

The City Council met in regular session Monday night, with all the members present excepting Messrs Dunham, Jenkins and Watson. Mr. Jenkins came in later. T. W. Morrison sent in a communication calling attention to a "chestnut" claim of his for $83 50 for illegal advertising. The bill has been presented several times before and payment has been refused, yet Morrison has the audacity to again request its payment. The matter was referred to the Printing Committee, together with all the papers referring to the claim, and it now remains to be seen whether the committee will misuse the people's money to pay the false claim.

Claims were presented and referred as follows:

The monthly reports of the treasurer and collector were referred to the Finance Committee.

The following persons were declared duly elected members of the Fire Department: Engine Co., No. 2, Wm. F. Townley, Chas. H. Farlee; Zephyr Hook and Ladder Co., Chas. Peterson, John F. Ammon, Jacob Blimm, Jr.

The Finance Committee reported that it would be inexpedient to accept Mr. Chas. Hand's proposition. Report received and recommendation adopted.

The Fire and Building Committee through Mr. Erickson, reported unfavorably upon the petition of Mr. Asa Collier, for permission to erect a frame building in the rear of the Olympia alley. He also stated that two bids had been received for furnishing a heater for No. 2, engine house, viz: Carney Bros., $450; A. M. Griffin, $395. A resolution was adopted accepting the latter bid, and the Corporation Counsel was instructed to draw up a contract for the fulfillment of the work.

Mr. Marsh offered a resolution which prevailed, providing for the proper dispensation of the discounts on notes.

Mayor Hugh J. Grant, of New York city, communicated with the Council, asking the hearty co-operation of the city in the matter of holding the International Fair in New York in 1892. The paper was filed.

The following resolutions offered by Mr. Marsh, were all adopted: One authorizing the mayor and treasurer to execute a three month's note on the First National Bank for $4,000 in anticipation of taxes for 1889; another that the treasurer pay off the $500 note on the poor fund, and execute another note for $700 on the same fund; also providing for the payment of the fire department note, and the executing of another note for the same amount.

The street improvement ordinance was called to its third reading and adopted.

Mr. Marsh offered a resolution to the effect that the work done under the above ordinance be confined to Madison avenue, East and West Fourth streets. The resolution was adopted.

The same Councilman introduced an ordinance for the repair and permanent improvement of Elm place. Its was adopted on its second reading and ordered engrossed and advertised.

An appropriation of $3,350 was made for street work, the Auditing Committee reported on the claims sent in during the evening, and

The Council then adjourned.

—Mr. Thomas McFadden, a brother-in-law of Mr. Michael F. Watson called at THE PRESS office today and requested us to state that Mr. Watson and his wife have not left the city, as was falsely reported in the news of Monday evening.

Runaway on Front Street.

A horse belonging to Mr. A. H. Bowman of Evona ran away on Front street, Wednesday, but was captured by Mr. John Becker before any serious damage was done. A bolt which holds the shafts in position dropped out, allowing the shafts to fall on the animals' heels, and thus resulting in a runaway.

The first service in this new place of worship will be held next Sunday morning. The Sunday school, which was organized last Sunday with H. B. Wells as Superintendent, will meet there at the close of the service.

Improvements at Dunellen.

The Central Railroad Company is making extensive improvements about the Dunellen station. Amongst other repairs the company is making arrangements to lay several new tracks, just West of the station, so as to make provision for the drilling of passenger cars. The "yard" will extend as far West as Taylor's Hotel. Local trains will then run direct to the station, and the cars will be drilled in the "yard."

The fourth track for coal and freight trains, between Grant avenue and the "Hill," just beyond the Green Brook tanks, will be open for traffic within the course of a few weeks. Four tracks will then be open between Bound Brook and Elizabeth.

Councilman Marsh of this City Delivers the Welcoming Address.

The Marsh Family Association of America, opened their sixth annual meeting at the North Baptist church, Newark, October 2. The reunion commenced at 10 A. M., and closed that evening. The welcome address was delivered that day by Francis E. Marsh, of this city, and response was made by Lucius B. Marsh of Boston. Most of the words sung were original odes composed by members of this family. These meetings have been attended by persons from Canada and various parts of the United States, and much valuable historical knowledge has been gained. Only persons by the name of Marsh attend the meetings.

Besides the above and other exercises, a series of general remarks and questions was a feature of the programme. This was led by City Clerk, O. B. Leonard, of Plainfield, whose wife is a daughter of the late Elston Marsh. It had been intended to continue the reunion until the next morning, but it closed above night. Mr. F. E. Marsh was elected Vice President for the ensuing year.

The last reunion was held at Bridgeport, Conn., Sept. 5 and 6, 1888. Mr. E. J. Marsh has published a volume of 200 pages, giving descendants of Geo. Marsh of Hingham, 1635. Col. L. B. Marsh of Boston, has published an account of the descendants of John Marsh of Salem, 1633. Killed an Eagle at Feltville.

To Restore Its Course.

The recent freshets in this city have changed the course of Green Brook so that the water washes against the parapet of one of the bridges, and Freeholder Vanderbeek offered a resolution at the Board meeting on Thursday, giving the Plainfield bridge committee power to restore the course of the brook. The resolution was amended by directing the committee to confer with the Somerset county freeholders.

The German Fair.

The ladies of the Aid Society of the German Reformed church are hard at work arranging for a grand fair, which will take place during the first week in November. The proceeds will go to the church fund. The church has a debt which is due to the building fund of the Board of Missions of the Reformed church of America. It is true that this debt is not exactly pressing at the present time, but the congregation have a desire to be prepared to meet their liabilities, and it is on this account that the fair is held.

Death of a John Brown Juror

John C. McClure, aged 85, uncle of Counsellor W. K. McClure of this city, died at his farm home, near Summit Point, West Virginia, Monday morning. Mr. McClure was the last survivor of the John Brown jury save one. At the time of the verdict in the "Ossawatomie" Brown case, in 1859, it was predicted that violent death would come to the jury which returned the death sentence, but out of the eleven who have died only one death, that of Walter Shirley, was violent. Shirley was thrown from his horse a few years ago, and so badly injured that he died shortly afterward.

Mr. McClure was a communicant of the Lutheran church, and universally esteemed. His end was peaceful and his death is greatly deplored.

At Trinity Reformed Church.

The disagreeable weather of Sunday did not prevent a very gratifying attendance at the communion services of the Trinity Reformed church, and the hearts of pastor and people were made glad by an accession of eight new members, three on confession of their faith and need of a Saviour, and five from other churches. When it is remembered that this church has been without a regular pastor the past three months (the Rev. Mr. Schenck having been absent in Europe), it certainly denotes a healthy spiritual condition.

At the evening service the pastor, Rev. Cornelius Schenck, preached from the fourteenth chapter of St. John; the twelfth verse. His discourse was an able, comprehensive exposition of the text, and was delivered in his usual earnest style, leaving a lasting impression on the hearts of his hearers.

Reform Hall.

Reform Hall Sunday night contained a moderate-sized but very appreciative audience. President Harper occupied the chair, and Rev. E. M. Rodman of Grace Episcopal church, conducted the devotional services. Mr. Vanderbeek, the musical leader, was unavoidably absent, but sent for the evening an efficient substitute.

Doctor Rodman was the first speaker, and founding his remarks upon that graphic scene of Bible record, Paul before Felix, wherein the latter was made to tremble at the words of the illustrious Apostle touching Righteousness, Temperance and the Judgment to come, he proceeded to point out in an instructive and convincing manner the evils of wrong doing and the blessed results of right living. The reverend gentleman's remarks were thoroughly sound and practical and commanded unbroken attention.

Capt. Ostrom followed in a short address, replete with striking illustrations and Christian truths and charity. He, too, received the profound attention of every person present.

With the benediction pronounced by Doctor Rodman the highly interesting meeting closed.

To Locate in New York.

The following extracts from Albany papers will be read with interest:

"We are sorry to learn of the contemplated removal of the Cleveland baking powder business from this city. We understand that its rapidly increasing business will shortly render enlarged facilities desirable, so that the proprietors have determined to remove to New York, where their export trade can be more conveniently handled.

"Albanians, who have watched the growth of this business from small beginnings to its present mammoth proportions, will regret to see it go, but will rejoice with its owners in its new prosperity. It is but just to say that Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder as a food product has the enviable reputation of being a thoroughly wholesome, effective, and honestly made article. The people of Albany and vicinity have known this fact for about a score of years and have shown their appreciation by their steadily increasing consumption of this excellent baking powder. This, and the fact that all recent investigations, including those made by the Food Commissioners of the States of Ohio and New Jersey and of the Canadian Government, show that Cleveland's is superior to any baking powder on the market, have so increased the business that more extensive accommodations are necessary.

"A new label is being prepared, but the old name "Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder" and the heretofore high quality of goods will be maintained.

"Dr. Hoagland, the first, and for many years, President, and Wm. Zeigler, former Treasurer, of the Royal company, two of its main props, have now left it. The former will be President of the new company, and his known integrity, liberality, and experience promises great success for the new organization, and lively times for all competitors."

Dodge—Courvoisier.

At eight o'clock of Wednesday evening, Oct. 16, at the Eglise du Saint Esprit, on Twenty-second street near Fifth avenue, New-York, will take place the marriage of Miss Elise Courvoisier, formerly of Central avenue, this city, and Mr. Henry Halsey Dodge, cousin of Mr. R. M. Stelle.

More Rooms for the Y's.

The Y's are at work again. A business meeting was held at the close of the parlor devotional meeting of Tuesday Oct. 1. The Union needs rooms to carry on its work. The matter was discussed by those present and a committee appointed to complete arrangements. It is expected that the Union will soon be settled in new apartments.

Levied on His Household Effects.

Augustus Kinch, a colored man, recently left this city and found employment at Red Bank, storing his household goods here. Thursday Mr. Kinch intended to remove the goods to Red Bank, but Justice Nash hearing of this, intercepted the goods at the freight house, where he read the riot act and placed a levy on the furniture to satisfy a $12 tax bill. The goods are still at the freight house awaiting a settlement.

There was an unusually large attendance at the race track on Saturday afternoon to witness the usual trial contests of speed between local horses. The first race was between John Chandler's "Rambo," John Hayes' "Andy" and Mr. Brower's "Lady Bennett." "Rambo" won the first and third heats in 2.41 and 2.40. "Lady Bennett" took second heat in 2.38¼.

The concluding race was between John Osborn's "Marcaneer," Nate Robbin's "Doctor" and Mr. Churchill's "Selim." The first named won two straight heats in 2.53¼ and 2.50.

The racing will be continued until cold weather sets in.

Faced With Ill Luck.

Monday Miss Burt, one of the Public School teachers, fell and wrenched her hip badly, but she was still able to walk. Next morning, as she was leaving her home, she fell again and broke the same hip. Drs. Endicott and Berg treated the fracture in their usual skillful way, but the patient will be confined to her bed for some time.

Last Winter Miss Burt was thrown out of a sleigh and severely bruised in the side. This developed in dangerous symptoms that necessitated her undergoing professional treatment and a surgical operation at Muhlenberg Hospital. But she had entirely recovered from all that and was again attending to her school duties, when Tuesday's misfortune came.

One Hundred and Fifteen Years Old.

"The Man About Town" in Monday's New York Star says:

"Many people in Union and Middlesex counties, N. J., remember Noah Rabey, who periodically made his appearance in Plainfield and towns near by and asked for work. The last time I saw him he was a resident at the Piscataway poor house, and was 115 years old. He cannot remember the exact date of his birth, but says it was 1774 or 1775. Fifty years ago he worked for John Kean, near Elizabeth, N. J., whose son, John Kean, Jr., represented his district at Washington not very long ago. Noah was over 50 years of age when he dwelt on the Kean farm, so his claim to the honor of being a centenarian, at least, is well established. The old man was well when I saw him, and enjoyed his pipe and tobacco regularly three times a day."

Y. P. S. C. E.

The annual meeting of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the Trinity Reformed church, was held Monday. The audience was very large, over one hundred and fifty being in attendance and Christian unity prevailed. Only one nomination was made for each office, the secretary casting the ballot. The following were elected:

President—Mr. F. S. Dunn.
1st Vice Pres.—Mr. Chas. F. Gellnaar.
2d Vice Pres.—Mrs. C. Schenck.
Rec. Secretary—Mr. J. S. Dunn.
Cor. Secretary—Miss E. C. Benedict.
Treasurer—Miss J. Johnson.

This society is the largest in Union county and is steadily growing in number and spiritual interest. One of its members has recently been admitted into Rutgers Theological Seminary as a candidate for the ministery. The society will hold its fourth anniversary exercises in the church on Friday evening of this week, to which all are invited.

Base Ball Among the Public School Classes.

The base ball team of the Third and Fourth classes of the Public School, defeated the team of Seniors and Juniors, Thursday, by one run. The winning nine did the heaviest hitting—Sutphen, Angleman and Laing each getting a two-bagger. The game was called on account of darkness at the end of the fourth inning.

The score was:

Death of Mrs. Robert Walker.

Mrs. Agnes A. Walker, wife of Mr. Robert Walker, and only sister of the late Mrs. Randolph Marsh, of this city, died at "The Retreat," Hartford, Conn., last Friday night. She was born in Greenock, Scotland, and came to Hartford, when a young woman. There she married Mr. Walker, and had since resided in that city. Five years ago their only son, William J., aged 19, fell from the roof of the house of Mr. Andrew T. Smith, on Prospect avenue, and was killed.

Mrs. Walker was nearly crazed at the time, and her grief affected her mind so much that she was never wholly rational afterward, and was troubled with insomnia. She was cared for at her home, however, until last March, when her condition became such that she was removed to the Retreat. She leaves besides her husband, one daughter. The funeral took place from Mr. Walker's home, No. 70 William street, Hartford, at 2:30 Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Burdick's Crusade.

Music Hall has been engaged by the ladies of the W. C. T. U., for Gospel temperance meetings, led by Mr. Burdick, during the evenings of November, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 20, 22 and 23, commencing Sunday afternoon at four o'clock on Nov. 10.

President Harper.

At a regular and well attended business meeting of the Plainfield Reform Club, held Thursday, ex-Judge Nathan Harper was unanimously elected President for the three months unexpired term of President French resigned. The annual election for President of the Club occurs, December 5.

A Handsome Wagon.

A very handsome milk wagon for the Holly Grove dairy farm at Plainfield, has just been turned out by carriage builder W. C. Brown, of 287 Burnet street, New Brunswick. It is reliably built, substantially ironed, and painted in tastefully disposed colors in which carmine, drab, corn color, black and gold predominate. It will present an attractive appearance on the street.

To Inspect the Pond Tool Works.

Chief Engineer Loring has been ordered by the Naval Department at Washington, to inspect the Pond Machine Works at Plainfield and report on the capacity of the works and the character of the work, so far as ship construction is concerned. We venture to state that the Pond Tool Works is equipped for and capable of building anything in the line above referred to.

A Plainfield Clergyman Officiates.

Miss Emma C. Hagstoz was united in marrige to Mr. Henry Askins, Wednesday Oct. 2, at the home of the bride's parents, No. 62 Columbia street, Newark, the Rev. J. P. Taylor, of this city, performing the ceremony. Miss Hagstoz is the daughter of Thomas Hagtoz, the President of the Essex Watch Case Company, and Mr. Askins is the business manager of one of Aronson's comic opera companies.

Stealing Still.

Among the items in Thursday's news copied from THE PRESS of the day before, were:

The announcement of Miss Jackson's wedding, Oct. 17;

The newly elected officers of Warren Mission Y. P. S. C. E.;

The departure of Mrs. G. L. VanEmburgh for Greenwood Lake;

The death of Mrs. Cornelia Sliter;

The Ladies Contribute.

On Sept. 28, Miss Frances E. Willard, National President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, celebrated her fiftieth birthday. The wearers of the white ribbon, scattered throughout the whole United States, devised a happy plan by which to commemorate the event. Each local union was requested to contribute one dollar toward creating a fund to be permanently invested in good securities, the interest of which will be at Miss Willard's disposal.

Miss Willard has spared neither strength nor money in her efforts to further the interests of the cause, and in her earlier days gave to it many years of labor without remuneration. This birthday offering is intended as an expression of appreciation and affection from her sisters in the work.

Another Victim of the "news."

Scarcely a day passes that THE PRESS is not requested to deny certain false statements published in the news. Here is another sample of deliberate fabrication published in that paper Thursday, which is intended not only to injure the young man's reputation but also to disgrace his parents:

"The parents of John Devlin, who reside in Bound Brook, received word yesterday that their son had been mortally wounded in a drunken brawl at Jersey City. They immediately proceeded to Jersey City, but when they arrived the young man had breathed his last. It appears that Devlin was implicated in a street fight and when an officer attempted to arrest him he resisted and was clubbed into submission."

Miss Mary Devlin, a sister of the young man referred to, called at THE PRESS office next morning, and denounced the above item as a base fabrication of the facts. She says that her brother, who is employed in a laundry and boards at No. 88 Raymond street, Brooklyn, was admitted to the Hospital on Tuesday evening, suffering from pneumonia and bronchial troubles. The patient has been ill for about two weeks, and although his condition is dangerous, he is yet alive and his chances for recovery are good.

GOOD ENOUGH!

It is proposed to organize another Plainfield Vocal Society under a competent Conductor—probably not Mr. R. J. Fitzhugh—that will be composed of the best vocalists in the city. Enough encouragement has already been given at a meeting reported exclusively in these columns, to warrant the belief that the Society will be eminently successful in all its parts.

A number of the city's best vocalists have been invited to attend a meeting for organization, to behold Thursday evening, October 10, at 8 o'clock, in "Vincent Chapel." Those present at this meeting will be considered constituent members without examination, upon enrolling their names, otherwise, should they wish to join the Society at some future time, the customary examinations will be required.

THE PRESS pledges in advance its modest support. The scheme will meet the endorsement of the people also. That it will be a success is assured because it is in the hands of Messrs C. W. McCutchen, W. W. Howland, D. E. Titsworth, H. O. Newman, S. J. Mitchell, D. E. Davis, H. A. McGee, W. R. Cock.

Very Badly Injured.

William H. Parlaman, a brakeman employed upon the Central Railroad, and living at Mauch Chunk, was taken to St. Michael's Hospital in Newark, on Saturday, suffering from severe injuries received by being struck by a coal car at Bound Brook at 4 o'clock that morning. He was still unconscious when received at the Hospital, and his recovery is regarded as doubtful.

Twenty-third Annual Session.

The twenty-third annual session of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars of New Jersey, will be held at Bridgeton, commencing Wednesday, Oct. 16, at 10 A. M., continuing two days. This session will undoubtedly be the grandest ever held by the Order in this State. The Mayor of Bridgeton will deliver an address of welcome and extend to the visitors the freedom of the city.

Part of the Mystery Solved.

The corpse found on the Dorsey farm, near Liberty Corner, last week, has been partially identified by the clothing as that of Hugh Higgins, a blacksmith, who lived in this city. He had been missing since July 15. He was thirty-five years old and leaves a widow and two children. How he met his death so far away from home remains a mystery. Higgins was seen at White House a few days after he left home.

Two Contested Will Cases.

The Latimer contested will case, which has dragged along for several months in the Union County Orphans' Court, came up for a hearing on Wednesday before Judge McCormick. Sarah M. Latimer of this city, died last Winter, leaving a part of her fortune, about $100,000, to charitable institutions of Plainfield. The will is contested by would be executors. It is said that a compromise will probably be effected, and the objections to the will withdrawn.

The Frazee Lee contested will case, it is expected, will occupy the greater part of the present session of the Union County courts.

A Very Old Farm.

The Charles Bailey farm, on the road leading to Basking Ridge, consisting of about 120 acres, was sold at public sale, under partition proceedings, a few days since, to Theodore J. Bailey, one of the heirs, for $5,585. It has been in the Bailey family many years, having been devised to Charles Bailey by his father, Benjamin Bailey, whose will it was alleged, had been destroyed. Proceedings in Chancery were commenced by the heirs, and the best legal talent employed. The will was never found, but the Court decreed that the provisions should be carried out as ascertained from the original draft, which was produced in court by the executor of the lawyer who drew the will.

The Dunellen Club Win the Handren Challenge Cup Forever.

The Middlesex County and the Dunellen Bowling Green Clubs, completed Thursday at Schepflin's Green, Dunellen, for the Handren Challenge Cup. The match terminated in favor of the latter, by a score of 75 to 68. This makes the Dunellen Club permanent holders of the trophy, having been victors for three seasons in succession.

The contest was a spirited one, and although the Middlesex Club is the younger, it was admitted by all that had they had a half-hour more, the result would have been changed. Among the members of the Middlesex Club are County Superintendent of Public Instruction Willis, Powelson Bros., Dr. S. Long and others of New Brunswick; F. P. Hafner, F. J. Richter, C. Schepflin and others of Dunellen. The latter is also a member of the victorious Club, and consequently did not roll on either side.

The Schepflin Cup will be competed for on this Thursday by the members of the Dunellen Club, and on the same day of the week following, both Clubs will come together in contests for the Stevens Medal, which will end the games for the season.

The scores of the rinks Thursday were as follows:

Rink 1—Dunellen—T. Wooley, Major J. E. Haynes, Henry McKnight, Jas. Stevens, skip; score, 37. Middlesex—E. U. Johnson, W. E. Lindstedt, H. B. Willis, J. B. Betts, skip; score, 29.

Rink 2—Dunellen—Jas. H. Smith, Wm. Elliott, D. B. S. Corkburn, Thos. Stone, skip; score, 38. Middlesex—L. A. Powelson, S. M. Pettit, C. S. Hodgson, Fred Weigel, skip; score, 39.

Pain and dread attend the use of most catarrh remedies. Liquids and snuffs are unpleasant as well as dangerous. Ely's Cream Balm is safe, pleasant, easily applied into the nostrils, and a sure cure. It cleanses the nasal passages and heals the inflamed membrane, giving relief at once. Price 50c.

When you need a good, safe laxative, ask your druggist for a box of Ayer's Pills, and you will find that they give perfect satisfaction. For indigestion, torpid liver, and, sick headache, there is nothing superior. Leading physicians recommend them.

The most obstinate cases of catarrh are cured by the use of Ely's Cream Balm, the only agreeable remedy. It is not a liquid or snuff, is easily applied into the nostrils. For cold in the head it is magical! It gives relief at once. Price 50c.

Professor Gauthier, of Paris, states that certain vital processes of the body develop putrifying substances in the tissues, which, if not speedily eliminated, produce disease. Ayer's Sarsaparilla effects the removal of these substances, and thereby preserves health.

Coughing

IS Nature's effort to expel foreign substances from the bronchial passages. Frequently, this causes inflammation and the need of an anodyne. No other expectorant or anodyne is equal to Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. It assists Nature in ejecting the mucus, allays irritation, induces repose, and is the most popular of all cough cures.

"Of the many preparations before the public for the cure of colds, coughs, bronchitis, and kindred diseases, there is none, within the range of my experience, so reliable as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. For years I was subject to colds, followed by terrible coughs. About four years ago, when so afflicted, I was advised to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral and to lay all other remedies aside. I did so, and within a week was well of my cold and cough. Since then I have always kept this preparation in the house, and feel comparatively secure."—Mrs. L. L. Brown, Denmark, Miss.

"A few years ago I took a severe cold which affected my lungs. I had a terrible cough, and passed night after night without sleep. The doctors gave me up. I tried Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which relieved my lungs, induced sleep, and afforded the rest necessary for the recovery of my strength. By the continual use of the Pectoral a permanent cure was effected."—Horace Fairbrother, Rockingham, Vt.

That's just what the average man finds that he requires, two pairs of pants to every suit. We know this to be so from the quantity of separate pants we sell. To meet this demand we always keep a stock of independent pants of every shade of color, of every variety of material and of every size. At the beginning of the season the stock is fullest, of course, and it is a good time in which to match up a portion of a suit. No matter whether you are long or short, thick or thin, nor what kind of a suit you want to match, you will find what you want right here. If you don't you certainly will not find it anywhere else.

Pants to work in; pants to wear to business; pants for Sunday or dress, and pants fit to be married in. What more need we say? Step in and match up the old suit and thus save the cost of a new one for a month or two. Poor advice for us to give, you think? That's so, perhaps, but we'll secure your gratitude and good will now, and your money for a new suit will follow later.

DECEIVING THE ENEMY.

How a Pair of Red Foxes Kept a Dog Away From Their Young.

In the spring of [illegible] a pair of red foxes took up their home on a Dakota farm. They dug several holes on a knoll in a wheat field, and soon after four "kits," or young foxes, arrived. Every day, while harvesting and [illegible] wheat in the field, says the farmer, I saw the two old foxes lying on the ground in front of their home. The kits frolicked about in the sun, played with the bushy tails of their parents and enjoyed themselves apparently as much as a group of kittens.

One morning a neighbor came to work in a field adjoining, bringing with him a dog, and the dog, with all the curiosity of his kind, soon began the investigation of both farms.

He was still a long distance from the fox-den when I heard a sharp, warning bark and saw the kits disappear. [illegible] the mother-fox lay on the ground, her ears erect, her eyes on the ground, all attention. The father of the family [illegible]

[illegible]

It is hard to say which we admired most; the bravery of the pair in challenging the dog to a race that would have proved fatal had he caught them, their ingenuity in taking turns so that each might be fresh when chased, their skill in leading him away from their young, or their cleverness in throwing him off their track when far enough away.

"MUGGY"

Not a Slang Word as Many People Suppose.

People who imagine that they are talking slang when they call such a day as this a "muggy" day, and put the words in quotation marks, as if they felt apologetically a little wicked in using the word, will be reassured when they are told what the history of the word really is. [illegible]

[illegible] It is allied with the word mucky, which means about the same thing, and also with the word murky. Looking up this etymology, one is confronted with the circumstance that the word-hunting word "muky" applied to a black man, may be good English after all, and mean simply a foggy, smoky person.

NEW YORK WANTS THE FAIR.

Some of the Notable Reasons Why It Should Be Allowed to Grab It.

Mr. Fielding, of the Committee on Suggestions from Outsiders, Shows the Advantages of New York City for the Strength of the Fair.

[COPYRIGHT 1889.]

The following, which is intended to be read with interest by the citizens of Chicago, St. Louis, Salt Lake City, Dutch Flat, Red Dog and other Western towns now laboring under the delusion that they can wrest from New York the honor of the World's Fair in 1892, will, I am sure, close this unfortunate controversy forever. I shall show that New York is the place; that no other town in the United States can pull such an appropriation out of Congress as we can; that we are in the front rank of progress in both directions; and, finally, that nowhere else have the forces of civilization in the last four hundred years developed so many things [illegible] which will be viewed with much wonder and delight by the natives of other lands.

As a prominent member of the Committee on Suggestions from Outsiders, I proposed to know something about this show. If it isn't a success it will not be my fault. It was I who suggested holding the exhibition on an elevated platform, supported by balloons. [illegible]

New York is full of historic interest, among which may be mentioned the place where the Washington Memorial Arch will stand if the money is raised; [illegible]

[illegible]

Also, we have close at hand a number of articles that could be [illegible]

and would add greatly to the interest of the show. There is the Prohibition movement in New Jersey which could be brought over in a day; the trusty lanes of Connecticut which could walk; the contract meeting of the Assembly-room at Albany which is likely to come down any day, and many other things to surprise and entertain the visitor.

The main object of a World's Fair, anyhow, is to attract the attention of other lands and induce if possible to get square with Paris for the amount of money which our citizens have dropped over there this summer. For such a patriotic work New York has facilities which are not equalled elsewhere. From the sawdust dens and brokers of the down town portion to the elderly female boarders of the boarding and lodging district; yes, clear up to the flats, rents and fleas of Harlem we are prepared for our cousins from across the water, and if anything gets away from us then the New World is not the success that it seems.

Diplomatically too, New York is the place. I know nothing so likely to maintain and cement the valuable relations now existing between England and Fifth avenue as this show. The number of foreign dukes and other things who would go broke in this country during such a time would, no doubt, add largely to the list of matrimonial alliances with nobility, and would help to raise the tone on this side and the credit on the other of many famous families.

We have a greater number of interesting exhibits already prepared than any of our competitors could get up between this time and the date of the quadricentennial. In the line of machinery, for instance, we have Tammany Hall, one of the most instructive and entertaining machines in the country. It is now running in our town without a hitch. Its transference to any other town for the purposes of the fair would not only injure the machine but would be very expensive for the town.

Illustrating the progress of social organization we have many societies for the prevention of various things, and others for the promotion of the same—among the latter the finest police force for this particular purpose that ever passed a Civil Service examination without seeing it. All these organizations are doing well, and making a great deal of money out of contributions both voluntary and otherwise.

The Fair will be a stock company, and space has been reserved in the main building for Mr. Gould. He will be shown every day in full operation with the stock of the concern, and visitors will be warned by a sign: "Do not monkey with the buzz saw." It will be one of the most instructive portions of the exhibition. There will also be a gambling den which will be closed every night by the police and will reopen the next morning in the same place, thus illustrating the Law and Order methods of the Metropolis. Among other things, too, will be a street crossing in full view of the audience, whereon a man will be run over by a horse wagon every five minutes. The main parade will move up Broadway on the morning of the opening of the show, and will positively be blown up every thirty yards by an explosion in the subways. By these painstaking methods we shall hope to give a true picture of American life and death in this great city.

Among all the suggestions that have been made I am the most moved by that of the tower two thousand feet high. I can imagine myself standing alone upon its top, midway between New York and Heaven with a fair chance to decide which I preferred without giving offense to either locality. There would I stand while the sun set in the purple malarial haze of New Jersey—there, far above the wagons rattling over the pavements, and the gas companies tearing them up; above the rumble and [illegible] of the elevated railroad; there would I stand and proudly reflect that I was probably the only man in New York city who couldn't smell sewer gas.

WORLD'S FAIR 1892

THE RIGHT MAN IN THE RIGHT PLACE.

In conclusion I wish to state that we are not seeking this show in any spirit of selfishness. We recognize its national importance, and we are willing to do well by the nation if Congress will put up for it. Standing as we do midway between Jersey City and Long Island we occupy a central position which should not be overlooked. We want this show; we have done more talking about it than any other town and we mean to keep it up. We do not intend to exclude anybody. On the other hand we extend a welcoming hand to all, and if the price of board goes up, we are not responsible.

FORTUNE AWAITS HER.

Romantic Story of an Iowa Girl Who Was Stolen From Her Mother.

The papers a few days ago, writes a Chicago Times correspondent from Sioux City, Ia., contained a brief account of the search that was being instituted for the mother of a young woman who is now a resident of that city, and who has a fortune awaiting her proper identification. A little more than twenty years ago Flora Adams was married to a young man named Andrews. Her parents opposed the match, and after the young people were wedded refused them shelter under the parental roof. All went well for awhile, but soon the husband tired of his bride and began to abuse her. The advent of a baby girl did not mend matters, and at the end of about two years Mrs. Andrews took her girl and went home to her widowed mother, her father having died in the meantime without bestowing forgiveness for her. He had not forgotten his infant granddaughter, however, and his will provided that [illegible] the interest and principal to go to her when she arrived at legal age.

Two weeks after his wife had left him Andrews went to the house and stole the little girl, leaving Chicago and going to Des Moines, Ia., then a prosperous village of about one-fifth its present population. The child was given into the charge of a Norwegian family named Nelson, by whom she was taught to regard herself as one of the family. She was called by her Christian name, Jeannette, but instead of Andrews she was made to believe that she was a Nelson. [illegible]

A WOLF FOSTER-MOTHER.

Capture of a Child with All the Instincts of an Animal.

Some twenty months ago a negro woman living on the banks of the Brazos, says a letter from Sandy Point, Tex., missed her three-months-old baby from the place where she had left it lying during an absence of a few minutes. Search was made for the infant, but no trace of it could be discovered, and the whole affair was wrapped in profound mystery until a few days ago.

A party of gentlemen were recently riding through a somewhat unfrequented portion of the thick woods that border the river, when they were startled by seeing a strange object run across the road. Thinking at first sight that it was a wild animal, several of the party were about to fire on it, when the one who had been nearest to it called to them not to shoot, but to ride it down instead. This was done with difficulty, for the underbrush was thick, but at last the creature was overtaken in a dense copse. It was half running, half leaping, first on all fours and then nearly upright.

The gentlemen dismounted and attempted to lay hands upon it, but it screamed frightfully and savagely biting and scratching it broke away from them. They could see that it had a human face, though the brown body was covered with long, tangled hair, and the nails of the feet and hands so long and curved as to be claws. It ran with incredible swiftness, getting over fallen trees and dense masses of creepers at a rate that obliged its pursuers to exert themselves to the utmost to keep it in view.

It finally ran into an immense oak tree that lay uprooted in the ground and the hollow trunk of which formed a yawning cavern. By the dint of poking in the tree with sticks the party succeeded in driving out an old wolf, which immediately took to its heels. It was not pursued, as it was not the object sought. This, too, was finally dislodged and lassoed with a lariat made of hides. It bit and scratched so fiercely that it was thought advisable not to approach it, so it was half dragged, half led home with the lariat about its neck, howling and yelling like a wolf.

The fact of the negro woman's child having disappeared was well known to all, and it was decided that this must be the child. The old wolf had evidently stolen it, and for some reason adopted it as its own. The mother declared that this conjecture was correct, claiming that her child had had a malformation of one ear, which peculiarity was found in the monster. It is kept tied up in her cabin, suffering no one to lay hands upon it, and is fed on raw meat, as it refuses to touch any other food. The woman has hopes that she may yet re-awaken the human in it, but, in the meantime, she is reaping a harvest from the crowds who come daily from all parts of the county to inspect the strange creature.

SOME SMALL THINGS.

Wonders of Nature, Science and Human Intelligence.

The 1,304,000 Pores of the Human Body—A Cherry-Stone Containing Twenty-Eight Perfect Dies—Diminutive Oxen and Sheep.

The human skin is perforated by, say in round numbers, 1,000 holes or pores, to the space of every square inch. If, therefore, we estimate the skin surface of the body of a middle-sized man at 16 square feet, that surface contains no fewer than 1,304,000 pores.

Pliny and Ælian relate that Myrmecides wrought an ivory chariot with four wheels and four horses, and a full-rigged ship, each so small that a bee's wing would hide them from view.

Hadrianus Junius writes that he saw at Mechlin, in Brabant, a cherry-stone cut into the form of a basket, in which some mechanic of the minute had deposited 28 dice, each perfect, with its spots plainly discernible to one with a good eye.

Turrianus, of whose skill so many wonderful things are related, is said to have fashioned iron mills, which could be wound up like the modern clock, so minute in size that one could be entirely hidden in the mouth of an ordinary man; yet they were powerful enough to grind, in a single day, grain enough to feed eight men.

A Mr. Beedle, living at Ottery St. Mary, Liverpool, Eng., once executed a much more difficult feat in penmanship than that accredited to John J. Taylor, of Streator, Ill. Mr. Taylor wrote 4,100 words on the blank side of a postal card. These cards are made 5¼ inches long and 3 inches in width. Mr. Beedle used a card 3¾ by 3¼ inches, which would be considerably smaller than the card used by Mr. Taylor. On this small piece of cardboard this penman, wielding a wizard's quill, wrote the following pieces without the slightest abbreviation: Goldsmith's "Traveler," "The Deserted Village," "Essay on Education," "Distress of a Disabled Soldier," "The Tale of Acbar," and the six essays on "Justice," "Generosity," "Irresolution of Youth," "Frailty of Man," "Friendship" and "The Genius of Love." In the center of the card there was a perfect picture of Ottery church, all the shades and lines being formed of parts of the writing. The miraculous production was finished with the national anthem of "God Save the Queen" and embellished with 72 stars, 31 crescents and 19 crosses. A snake with his tail in his mouth inclosed and finished this remarkable work.

The Ashantee cattle of the Cape Coast, South Africa, are the smallest of the bovine species. One recently brought to London, a bull, perfect in every particular except in size, weighed but 67 pounds. Seven were shipped on board the vessel, to be used as fresh meat during the voyage, the largest of these weighed when dressed ready for cooking 40 pounds. The bull, spared from the general slaughter on account of his playfulness, was allowed to run loose on deck and tease and be teased during the entire voyage.

The "running oxen" of Ceylon are also very small. However, their Lilliputian proportions are not to be compared with the midget bovine above mentioned. These "running oxen" are used in the mail service and are said to exhibit extraordinary powers of endurance for animals of their size, the largest of them not exceeding 200 pounds in weight. Two of them with a cart, a mail sack and a driver will make from 80 to 100 miles of a trip in a day.

The tiny Breton representative of the sheep family are the smallest of the sheep species. They are natives of Breton, France, and are not much larger than a full-grown jack-rabbit. A ram of four years could be entirely hidden in a common wooden bucket but for his horns. These are too small to be raised with profit either for mutton or for their wool. It is said that one has never been known to dress as much as 25 pounds.

An old man living near Portland, Me., has fashioned two ingenious pieces of mechanism. One a steam bark and the other a barkentine, built on a scale of one-eighth of an inch to the foot. Every detail observed in building big ships is strictly adhered to. Each plank is bolted and riveted with bolts made from pins, hammered out until they are not larger in diameter than a pin. The steam-engines and boilers are exact counterparts of those used in large ships. It took 464 days to complete them.

At Manchester, Eng., in 1816, a light-fingered mechanic made a wonderful little knife. It weighed but little over one pennyweight, and was provided with 16 useful articles, viz.: Three blades, a button-hook, saw, punch and screw-driver, cork-screw, hook and gimlet, two fleams, picker, tweezers and two lancets. The whole length of the knife was but eleven-sixteenths of an inch.

A very interesting curiosity was on exhibition at the great fair in Paris. It is a miniature working model of the great Creusot hammer—the largest in the world. It works in a glass case only two inches in height, a Lilliputian clock furnishing the motive power. The original hammer weighs 100 tons; the model nine grains.

IT STOOD THE TEST.

How a Deaf and Blind Woman Succeeded in Making a Will.

One of the most striking scenes in fiction is that wherein the paralytic in "Monte Cristo" makes a legal disposition of his property by the movement of his eyes. In a blue book recently published concerning the deaf and dumb, there is an account of the making of a will by a woman who, having been stone deaf all her life, became, when sixty years old, blind also. The place was a country town, Ludlow, in Shropshire, and the mayor, the rector and the chief medical men were all present to witness that every thing was done above board and without collusion.

"A copy of the will lay before the deaf blind lady and myself, and another copy was before the gentleman sitting in the seat corresponding with your lordship," said a witness in the case when it was before the courts. "I began spelling on her hand with perfect silence one sentence. She turned to the lady on her right and spelt on both her hands the sentence that I had just repeated to her. That lady, having nothing before her, repeated aloud what presumably I had said to the blind lady, and when certainly the blind lady had said to her; and the official gentlemen on the other and over that they were actually the very words in the will before them."

"So it went on. She stopped me in one place and said, 'not a thousand, a hundred,' showing that she knew the value of money; and she willed away the whole of her property with perfect accuracy. She left a portion of it to the very persons who had desired to keep it from her, and they were her blind relations. She left £100 to the institution whose head master helped her to make such a will. That was the last time that I saw her. The will was contested by the relatives. When it came to be tested they said nobody in such a condition as that could make a will. We fought the battle in the probate court at Westminster and won. The will was proved [illegible]."

LABOR AND LABORERS.

Reutlingen, Germany, has a weaving school. At Reutlingen operatives lunch at 10, and from 12 to 1, and have afternoon rest from 3 to 3:30, and supper at 7. Singing is always to be heard and the operatives, especially the girls, are pictures of health and beauty.

A DRIVING YOUNG MAN.

He Was a Trifle Behind Time, But Got There Just the Same.

"Talk about get up and get, with a dash of American nerve, I saw a good specimen of it yesterday," said Uncle Silas Bowersox to a New York World reporter. "A young man jumped on a Broadway car at Chambers street followed by a bootblack. With a curt 'don't mind us' from the youth the bootblack went to work on the young man's boots, while he pulled a writing tablet out of his pocket and proceeded to dash off a letter.

"'Oh, but I must,' replied the young man. 'Got to do it; case of emergency.' And as he handed the conductor the fare he whispered something in his ear that seemed to satisfy that official.

"When we reached Prince street the man's boots wore a patent-leather shine. He had four letters written, sealed in an envelope and addressed. Handing them to the bootblack, with a coin, he gave the boy directions where to deliver them and return with an answer. 'I'll be there at 4:45—just twenty minutes,' he said, looking at his watch, 'and you have just time to make it. Now gallop.' The boy left the car and disappeared on a run.

"The young man took a seat in the car, opened a grip and taking out a clean pair of cuffs, collar and white necktie, put them on. He then took out a hair-brush and pocket mirror, brushed his hair, put wax on his mustache, squirted some cologne on a fresh handkerchief, put a clove in his mouth, knocked the dust from his hat and clothing with a wisp-broom, and giving his cuffs a finishing jerk turned to the people in the car and said:

"'Ladies and gentlemen, an apology is due you, and some explanation is likewise due myself. I don't wish to be considered fussy. I'm no dude, and I don't spend half my time before the looking-glass, as you might infer. I'm a plain, practical, every day sort of a chap from Bridgeport, Conn. In just twenty minutes by the watch I am to be married to the boss girl of New York City, barring none. My train is two hours late, but thanks to the conductor of this car and your own kind indulgence I'll get there just the same.'

"And all the people in the car thought he would."

A PRIZE FISH YARN.

It Was Told by a Kentuckian, Hence It Must Be True.

The Chicago Times tells the most remarkable fish yarn of the season. It is ascribed to a Kentuckian, and runs as follows:

"Thomas D. Snyder, in the Illinois Bank building, is a fisher of men, enticing them to bite at his real-estate office. He hasn't had a rod in his hand since he played truant at school. Still he had a friend who, he says, was fishing in an Illinois river a short time ago when he caught a sixteen-pound pickerel. 'That is not so extraordinary,' continued the good-natured real-estate man. 'Just as large fish have been caught before, and will be again. But I am assured by him that when he opened the fish he found it had swallowed a muskallonge weighing nine pounds. Opening the muskallonge he found in its stomach a four-pound black bass, inside of whose stomach was a one and one-half pound yellow bass, which in turn had swallowed a half-pound sunfish, and inside the latter was a beautiful, ruby-throat humming-bird, not yet dead. Indeed, he has it at home in a beautiful little cage, where it hums happily all the day long. All the fish were as sound as though life had not been extinct, and from the fact that the humming-bird was yet alive, and it being the first of the crowd that was swallowed, it would seem that all this extraordinary swallowing, winding up with the capture of the pickerel, must have been within the space of seven minutes.' While Mr. S. declined to verify the statement in all its particulars, he said his informant was the son of a preacher and born in Breathitt County, Ky., either of which distinction ought to be sufficient proof of his veracity and his character for truth."

SINGING IN FEAR.

General Manifestation of Terror Given By a Famous Woman.

The vision of sudden death is often accompanied by a view of the past life, not as a procession of events, but rather as an instantaneous picture, or as a reflection in a mirror. During a severe storm at sea Mrs. Frances Kemble passed through an experience of this kind, which she describes in her "Records of Later Days."

The terrific gale lasted nearly four days, during which time she and her nurse, the only women on board the ship, were prisoners in the dark cabin, the skylights of which had been closely covered to protect the passengers from the seas that broke over the deck.

At the height of the storm the nurse passed the night in prayers, without once rising from her knees. Mrs. Kemble sat on the cabin floor and saw plainly the whole of her past life. With the vision came an almost despairing sense of loss and waste. Then followed a brief survey of her religious belief, and that seemed to her her only [illegible]

This spiritual mood, during which there was the utmost tension of mind and body, gave way to an exhaustion, which she could only relieve by singing every song she could recollect—English, Scotch, Irish, Welsh, French, German, Italian and Spanish. She sang them loudly, one after another, in rapid succession. Not till the day broke and the sense of danger passed away with the [illegible]

When the abating of the storm allowed the captain to leave the deck, he came into the cabin and congratulated Mrs. Kemble upon her courage.

"At the very height of the storm, I am told, you were heard singing away like a bird."

Mrs. Kemble had some difficulty in making the captain see that he had drawn a mistaken inference from her action, and that fear instead of courage had prompted her to sing.

"Did you read my play?" said Penley to Banks.

"Yes."

"How did it strike you?"

"Forcibly. I couldn't restrain my emotion."

"That's true," broke in Bank's wife; "I was in the next room when he read it and I never heard a man swear so in my life."

AMONG THE SHIPPING.

Peculiar Sights to Be Seen Around the Chicago Docks.

How the Lumber-Shovers Earn Their Wages—The Hard Lot of Fresh-Water Sailors—Dock Rats, Both Animal and Human.

The docks of a great city offer strange and interesting sights and sounds and present a peculiar phase of life, says the Chicago Times. It has a class of people who not only work among them but who may be said to live there and become peculiar to the place. They seldom go away from the water-side day or night.

The other day I watched a barge from which the lumber was being taken by a gang of seventy-five men. It was a huge, broad boat with two masts, and carried 1,000,000 feet of lumber. The masts are used for sails which serve no other purpose except to steady the boat in a heavy sea as she is being towed.

It was curious to see how these seventy-five men were kept busy pulling that lumber out of the sides of the barge and piling it up on the docks or carrying it to waiting wagons to haul it away. I was sure that some kind of new-fangled machinery was used.

Looking in the hold aft only four men, in pairs, were seen. They were dressed in their underclothing and were trotting back and forth like a horse in a canter, taking seven planks at a time and shoving them out to the men on the docks and trotting back for others. They had to trot. They were expected to keep eight men busy taking that lumber out and putting it in piles to be taken up and carried farther away by eight other men. In reality these four men, with a like four in the bow, kept the seventy-five men on the docks busy. Did they falter in their trot they would be "docked" by the ever-vigilant time-keeper.

These workmen were of all nationalities, it seemed, from the conglomerate sounds made by their talk. There were Poles, Bohemians, Russians, Africans, Greeks, Scandinavians, and, I believe, Scythians, Elamites, Mesopotamians, Romans, friends and countrymen. Their wages ranged from one dollar to one dollar and fifty cents a day.

It was the hardest, fastest and hottest work I ever saw outside of a coal-stoking department of a steamship.

The cabin, or rather sleeping apartments for the whole crew, as captain, mate, boatswain, cook and men all sleep in one place, is veritably a place of contrasts. The bunks are like prison bunks in Russia, and are small, close and dirty. The bedding looks as though it would have to be tied down to keep it from walking overboard. The doors and windows are kept shut tight—probably to keep the blankets from going ashore for fresh air.

But in contrast to this the "galley" is very clean. The pots and pans are bright and inviting and the floor as clean as the deck of a revenue cutter. The cook is an all-round man, too. He is one of the trotters I saw in the hold, but is relieved an hour or two before each meal-time so as to prepare dinner or supper. He must "turn out" early enough to get breakfast for the others. For this he gets a few cents more per day than the others and is happy. None of them seem to mind work, and are joking, laughing and singing all the time. I no longer wonder that so many Russians live through a Siberian exile.

As if to match the Babel mixture of people who live on the docks every class and rig of boat and water craft is seen.

"Chuff, chuff, chuff, chuff, chung, chung, chung, chung," and a tug goes skimming by dragging a little "cat-boat," as the fresh water "salts" contemptuously call those little mosquito-fleet vessels which ply around the edges of the lake. Then one will go puffing and wheezing and laboring down the river, leaving a stench behind and above and around her as she pulls a big steamer out, whistling like all possessed two blocks before she gets to a bridge, so as to have it opened long enough before she gets to it to set a thousand people swearing. The old proverb which says "Never cross a bridge till you get to it" should be made to apply to tugs and vessels not trying to go through a bridge on the Chicago river till they get to it. These little tugs are made up of one part boat, one part smoke-stack, one part ropes, three parts puff, and ninety-four parts of engine and screw. They can pull any thing, it seems. At least they pull any thing which can be floated in the water.

When night comes all is changed. The noise and roar and bustle cease. All is darkness, save where the fatal flicker of a street-lamp here and there sends its fitful glare over the piles of goods and stones and behind warehouses and lumber piles. The hundreds of boats lying along the docks for miles and miles up the river become dark, shadowy outlines, looming against the starlit heavens, but not a glimmer of reflection comes back from the bosom of the murky, frothing, slimy waters. It seems to swallow up the images of all that should be reflected from its bosom, just as it swallows up every thing of life which falls into it.

The rats come out by thousands and fight and feed and squeak as they swarm about in and over and on every thing. And those two-legged dock rats, who infest every city, come out and glide along on their nocturnal mission of crime and murder, and to carry out the dark purposes of their lives. The night history of the docks of a large city would reveal many a crime planned and carried out. It is the very region for such work.

Built Entirely for Business.

The Mexican wasp is built entirely for business. He is over two inches long when he is of age and is about the color of a bay horse. His stinger is full an inch long and as fine as a spider's web. Unlike the stinger of a common bee the stinger of a Mexican wasp is non-forfeitable. He don't give up after one lunge, but has it always in readiness for an all-day job if necessary. The mission of the Mexican wasp seems to be mainly to hunt up people and run that stinger of his into them. The natives say that he will go ten miles out of his way to get a whack at a person. The natives seem to get fat on snake bites and centipede bites and scorpion stings, but if they discover one of these wasps in the neighborhood they hunt for cover without delay.

Buttons in Her Nose.

According to a Cincinnati Enquirer correspondent, Miss Clara Bell, the twenty-two-year-old daughter of Mrs. John Bell, of Canton, O., is the subject of an odd experience. For years she has been troubled with what she supposed was catarrh. This affliction has bothered her since she was two years old, and a few days ago Miss Bell consulted a physician, who made an examination, and came to the conclusion that some foreign substance was lodged in one of the nostrils. He probed for it, and, after removing a few small pieces of bone, came upon a substance which, upon close examination, proved to be a small cloth-covered button. A second search brought forth another button. Now Miss Bell is breathing better than she has since infancy. When a babe she forced the buttons up her nostrils, and they have remained imbedded there ever since, and gave rise to the symptoms of chronic catarrh with which she thought she was suffering.

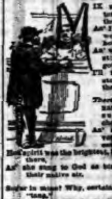
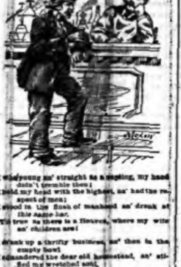
THE TRAMP'S STORY.



MIX me a drink, bartender; I've been in the hospital long,
An' I want an old-time welcome, so mix it hot an' strong;
An' while you mix an' stir it—oh, yes, I've got the pay—
I'll tell you a little story, it will pass the time away.

There was once a girl named Katy, she sung in a village choir,
An' above the other voices her's sweeter rose an' higher;
Her spirit was the brightest, her soul the purest there,
An' she sung to God as birds do who crave their native air.

Sugar in mine? Why, certain, an' lemon for a "tang."
Where was I? Oh! bartender, I married the girl who sang—
We had always loved each other an', bless me, the angels are,
We came to live in the city, an' I learned to drink at a bar.



I was young an' straight as a sapling, my hand didn't tremble then;
I held my head with the highest, an' had the respect of men;
I stood in the flush of manhood an' drank at this same bar.
'Tis true as there is a Heaven, where my wife an' children are!

I drank up a thrifty business, an' then in the empty bowl
I squandered the dear old homestead, an' stifled my wretched soul,
An' I broke the heart of my darling; God! can such things be true?
I felt her homeless and dying, and came to carouse with you.

Settle? That [illegible] the bitter, an' here's to your health, my friend!
No! my story isn't finished, but it's getting on to the end;
The children went with their mother, as children mostly do,
An' I buried them, or the city did—here's luck an' long life to you.

Who's that!—don't you see her?—there! my wife!—and the children, too!
Why, Katy, my girl, go home, go home; this isn't the place for you!
It isn't Katy!—I'm raving!—see here! I have money yet:
Give me another—stronger—I must forget,—forget!

Shay! isn't it awfully jolly, this drinking yourself to ruin?
An' getting the worth of your money, just as I have been doing!
Shay! is there any thing the matter? Don't put me into the street!
If I stay a little longer then my story'll be complete.

Shay! I'm your friend, bartender; what's the matter with me?
It's getting dark of a sudden—so dark I can not see.
Listen! there's some one singing! 'Tis Katy's voice I hear:
"W-a-t-c-h-i-n-g and w-a-i-t-i-n-g f-o-r t-h-e-e,

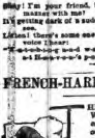
—MRS. M. L. RAYNE.

FRENCH-HARP JOHNNIE.



THE SOIL of Hog-Wallow Flats being capable of producing only scraggy post-oaks, was left by the pioneers in its primitive state. The oaks grew acorns, on which wild hogs subsisted. The poor natives subsisted on the hogs. On the edge of the Flats stood a grocery, whose front door looked across a lake at cultivated fields. This view was sometimes marred by episodes of human life, mean, wretched and tragic. The door could count more bullet holes in its bosom than there are weeks in the year; but it was mildest and never boasted of its scars.

Moon-Eyed Dave kept the grocery. He was a short, bowlegged, heavy, solemn-faced man with a slow movement; whether dealing out whisky or quelling a row, he was never in a hurry. He lived on whisky and peanuts; when not eating he was drinking, and when not drinking he was eating "pinders."

"Hurry up, Dave," said Lyt Dyer, a long, lean young man, with large hands and feet, exaggerated joints and a very small head. "I'm thirsty. You're the slowest-motioned licker-man I ever seed."

"I allers take my time, whatever I'm er doin'," replied Dave.

"Yes, an' you take er good sheer uv other fellows' time, too."

"Waal, ef I take some uv your'n, you won't miss it."

"Why?"

"Bekase you've got so much uv it to spare. In fack, it's erbout all you have got ter spare."

"See here, now, Dave, I hain't the only feller that owes you er licker bill. So don't start er ruckshun by takin' spite outen me."

"All right, Lyt, all right. I hain't in no fitter fight, nor laugh nuther, ter-day."

"What's the matter?"

"French-harp Johnnie's in thar"—pointing to a back room—"mighty sick."

"Dave, I wouldn't hurt your feelin's fur a barrel uv licker, but I can't see why you take on so over that idiot boy. He can't hardly feed hisself, and hain't fitten fur nuthin' but ter call hogs and play the French-harp."

Dave's moist eyes glared at the speaker, and he was almost in a hurry as he picked up the bottle. But he leisurely lifted it, placed it on the shelf behind him, and wiped off the counter with a dirty rag.

"Ef I didn't know, Lyt," he replied, "that you don't mean no harm by what you're sayin' I'd put ez many holes in you ez that door's got thar. Now, I'll answer you in the same sperret. When ole Logan Brothers wuz drawin' down on me with his Winchester that day when he kilt them Ransom boys, didn't Johnnie run behind an' trip him up? Wuz thar one uv you brave enuff ter do that, let erlone havin' sense enuff? But fur that, I'd be whar I put Logan. Whar'd I fin' the boy? I picked him up in the road las' summer, twixt here an' Shreveport. Leastwise, he clum inter the back end uv my waggin', so tired, an' pale, an' sick, that er meaner man than me couldn't er done nothin' but fetch 'im erlong. Hear him er moanin'! Come an' look at 'im."

They went into the room. The boy lay on a lounge on his back. The nostrils were tightly drawn in, by that force which the fingers of death alone exercise over the suffering face, and the threads of a smile that was grotesque and pitiful. He looked at Dave and babbled "water!" When refreshed, he picked, his trembling fingers, felt over the coverlet, looked again at Dave and whined.

"He wants his harp," said Dave, giving it to him.

He placed it in his mouth and played "Home, Sweet Home," in quivering strains. Then the pained head fell, the harp ceased and dropped from his lips to the pillow. The boy was dead.

Dave tore a long strip from the sheet on which the boy lay and left the room. He went through the bar followed by Lyt. "Pass out, Lyt," he said, "I gwinter close up." He locked the door, put the key in his pocket, tied the cloth to the knob and sat on the porch, his back against a post.

"This winds up the licker bizness, Lyt," he said.

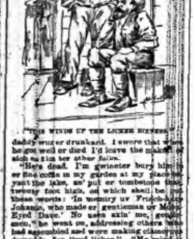
"Yonder comes Babe Dismukes," spoke Lyt, after a minute's silent grieving over the death of the "licker bizness," as a powerful young fellow, with sorrel beard and hair and a bray as loud as that of the mule he was riding, came up from the lake.

"Hello, Dave!" he brayed, as he approached, after hitching his mule. "What's up? What does that rag mean? Hev yer put the bar in mournin' bekase yer likker sourt by bein' watered too much?"

"Yes," drawled Dave, "hit's too sour fur your fine-haired taste. Less'wise hit's all thar [illegible], fur you won't git none."

"Come, Dave, this hain't the fust uv April, hit's the tenth uv November. Git up an' open yer shebang an' give me er drink, fur I'm dry ez er stumperch on er san'-bar."

"Nary drap do you git, nor nobody else, fur love nor money nor no other reason. Thar's forty gallon uv sperrets in this house, and I'll ship it back to pay er bill [illegible]. When that's done I'm done with the licker bizness. What's the matter? Nuthin', 'cep'n I've tuck er fool notion ter quit. An' I hain't ershamed ter acknowledge I got it frum French-harp Johnnie, who's layin' in thar on my bed dead. He saved my life, you know. That same night, when he was blowin' his harp, he stopped, looked at me an' sed: 'What's whisky fur, 'cept ter make men fight an' kill?' Then he went on playin', jes' ez if he hadn't said nothin'. When he got sick I nussed him. One night he riz up, skeered, grabbed me by the neck an' stared at sump'n in the darkness outside. 'O, daddy, don't kill me! don't kill me!' he screamed, an' hugged me so tight I most choked. Then I said ter myself his daddy wuz er drunkard. I swore that when he got well or died I'd leave the makin' of sich as him ter other folks.



"THIS WINDS UP THE LICKER BIZNESS."

"He's dead. I'm gwinter bury him in er fine coffin in my garden at my place beyant the lake, an' put er tombstone thar twenty foot high, on which shell be put these words: 'In memory uv French-harp Johnnie, who made er gentleman uv Moon-Eyed Dave.' No usen axin' me, gentlemen," he went on, addressing others who had assembled and were making clamorous demands for "red licker." "My mind is sot. Nary smell do yer git. An', though I'm changed in this one thing, I'm yet the same old Dave, what means what he says an' stan's squar up ter his word, you all know me."

They knew him, for they ceased to importune, and went home "dry."

Dave also stood square up to his word concerning French-harp Johnnie. A monument of white marble glistens in the sunlight on the farther shore of the lake, and traders wonder what it is. The curious find out by crossing the lake and spending a day and night with Moon-Eyed Dave.

CHARLES S. BLACKBURN.

NEVER HUNT BURGLARS.

Make a Noise and Scare Them from the Premises.

Various Kinds of Devices That Alarm the Intruder as Well as His Intended Victim—Automatic Alarms for Banks and Offices.

"Burglars in the house! Get up, quick!"

"Let 'em burgle."

"But I hear them rattling the silver. I'm sure we are being robbed. Do go down-stairs."

"Well, I would rather lose your silver than my life, so I guess I'll stay in bed."

The conversation may have occurred between Jones and his wife at three o'clock in the morning, after she had been awakened by strange sounds coming from the dining-room.

Was Jones a coward?

That is open to argument, for there are a good many people who have concluded, from recent events, that it is wise policy to avoid encountering a burglar plying his trade.

Most persons in such a case would make a lot of noise in the hope of frightening the intruder off; some nervous women might pull the bed-clothes over their heads so they could neither see nor hear and let things take their course; some men might march boldly down-stairs, and perhaps be shot or stabbed by a desperate robber.

Obviously it is better to keep burglars out of your house. The question is: How can it be done? What the people want to know is: How can they be protected against the visits of midnight marauders?

"Every body should know," said a police detective to a New York Journal reporter, "that the police can not stop burglaries. The best they can do is to catch the thieves after they have done their work.

"I think," continued the detective, "that every body who can should have some kind of burglar alarm. It doesn't matter what it is—any thing that will make a noise. And my advice to people is, if you think there is a thief in the house, tramp around, rattle things in a lively fashion. Nine times in ten you will scare him off. If you go to chasing after him unprepared to make a desperate fight, you are pretty apt to have trouble."

The principle of dealing with burglars as laid down by the detective has been recognized as the correct one, and devices for giving alarm to the inmates of a house of the entrance of a burglar have long been in use. Patents have been granted in Washington for over one thousand devices. The principle in all of them is substantially the same. The difference is only in the modus operandi.

Of course electricity is brought into play in the most approved modern burglar alarm. Wires run from every door and window in the house to the alarm apparatus, which in a city house is generally placed in the second floor hall, or in the sleeping apartment of the head of the house.

There is an indicator similar to annunciators used in hotels. When the house is closed for the night, a switch is turned, and the arrangement is in order. If a door or window is open, the big alarm bell will ring, and the indicator will show exactly which door or window is open. Thus you can determine whether the servants have left things in proper order. Of course at no time in the night can any door or window be opened without setting the bell going, and it will ring until you stop it. The bells commonly used are large enough to arouse every body in the house. But the burglar is the first to hear the sound, and he scampers off as lively as he can go.

This electric burglar-frightener sometimes goes off without sufficient provocation. Mice or rats have been known to interrupt the circuit by tampering with the wires, or pushing open a door not fastened. Under these circumstances there is apt to be consternation upstairs, and perhaps a solemn procession of white-robed figures armed with guns and pistols to the scene of the trouble as shown by the indicator.

One of the most ingenious devices of the kind is an idea of an officer, known for his partiality to fine jewelry and diamonds. It is a pick-pocket alarm. In his vest pocket he carries a French battery no larger than a match safe, with a tiny bell attached to it. The electric circuit runs through his watch chain. No one could steal his watch from his pocket without breaking the circuit and ringing the alarm bell.

The mechanical burglar alarms are devised principally for travelers, as electricity has largely supplanted them for homes. It gives the traveler some feeling of security to go to sleep in a hotel with the knowledge that if any one opens the door or window a bell will sound an alarm. The appliances for doing the work he can carry in his valise, or, may be, in his pocket.

A drummer recently displayed to some friends a novel device which he uses in his travels. When he goes to bed he screws it to the door-jam. It is simply a tube with a weight in it. A fulminating cap that goes off with a loud report is put in the tube. When the door opens it strikes a trigger which releases the weight and the cap is discharged. The drummer awakens and the intruder thinks he is shot.

Mechanical devices can be purchased which are wedge shaped. They are simply put on the floor in front of the door. Opening of the door depresses a spring and sets the work ringing a loud alarm. Scores of other devices do the same work in as many different ways.

The general public does not know how many of the banks, jewelry houses and other places of business where valuable goods are kept are protected against burglary. Watchmen sometimes fall asleep, or wander off, or are not [illegible]. So an ingenious electrician [illegible] a central protection office, with wires running from it to various places of business. Safes were provided with electric-lined cabinets, and doors and windows were connected with the circuit. Any disturbance of them whatever rings an alarm in the central office, and men are hurried over to see what the trouble is. If the business house is entered by an employe after being closed for the night, the alarm goes in just the same, and a record is made of the fact.

AT THE FALL OPENINGS

Of Loves of Toques and Dear Delights of Turbans.

Piquant Shapes in Felt and Velvet Which Attract Fashionable Dames—Jet Coronets and Greek Bands for the Heads of the Four Hundred.

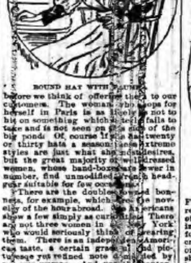
COPYRIGHT 1889.

"The army of American women which invaded the Paris Exposition this summer must have bought its autumn millinery abroad and hurt trade."

This remark was ventured in the presence of a man milliner, one of the designers and importers of hats and bonnets most favored by fashionable New Yorkers.

"Not so much," returned this magnate of toques and turbans, "not so much as you would suppose.

"A majority of well-to-do women who go abroad do less shopping there in proportion than was the case some years ago. A woman buys a hat in Paris and finds when she returns to New York that she simply can't wear it here. That which was charmingly odd and pretty in the French capital appears at once in our more restricted and conventional atmosphere outre and impossible. Of course the importing houses choose from among the Paris styles such as they think will please in with American ideas and even these they often essentially modify. Many of the hat shapes for instance are reblocked before we think of offering them to our customers. The woman who shops for herself in Paris is as likely as not to hit on something which utterly fails to take and is not seen on this side of the big pond. Of course if she has twenty or thirty hats a season these extreme styles are just what she most desires, but the great majority of well-dressed women, whose band-boxes are fewer in number, find unmodified French headgear suitable for few occasions.

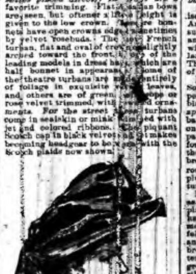


ROUND HAT WITH PLUMES.

"There are the double-crowned bonnets, for example, which are the novelty of the hour abroad. Few Americans show a few simply as curiosities. There are not three women in New York who would seriously think of wearing them. There is an independent American taste, a certain grace and picturesque yet refined note demanded by our own women. And yet the centennial of the French revolution has meant much for us in the way of artistic achievement and luxury. There are the exquisitely embroidered crown pieces in cloth, the wonderful color effect in ribbons, the gem-like garnitures in cut jet and beads, the Greek fret bands and coronets in gold galloon and metal braids, the superb autumn flowers and fancy feathers, all these come from the competition and rivalry of French exhibitors.

"Most of the new winter bonnets now on exhibition are tied down by strings coming from a point in the extreme back, giving a very youthful appearance. The round hats are larger than ever and have little or no brim behind, except where they turn up on the back as well as on the sides. The crowns are low, almost flat on occasion, and the brims are apt to be straight in front and to show open work embroidery or passementerie insertion as airy as the lace-like bands on the walking hats of August. Sometimes the crown itself is open-work—the wind goblins'll git yer hair if yer don't watch out—only the side crown being of any substantial material.

"Bonnets are very small. Velvet rosettes placed directly in front are a favorite trimming. Flat Alsatian bows are seen, but oftener a little height is given to the low crown. There are bonnets have open crowns edged sometimes by velvet rosebuds. The new French turban, flat and oval of crown, slightly arched toward the front, is one of the leading models in dress hats, which are half bonnet in appearance. Some of the theatre turbans are made entirely of foliage in exquisite velvet leaves, and others are of green velvet, [illegible] or rose velvet trimmed, with jetted ornaments. For the street the new turbans come in sealskin or mink finished with jet and colored ribbons. The piquant Scotch cap in black velvet and jet makes becoming headgear to be worn with the Scotch plaids now shown.



ENGLISH WALKING HAT.

Heliotrope will be the color of the winter in all the beautiful old tints and many new ones from lilac and dahlia through violet and reddish purple and Persian mauve. Next in favor came yellow and pale yellowish flame. Red dyes from rose to damask and crimson, green and pink run through high class millinery. A favorite mode of adornment is the coronet-like band of cut jet laid about the brim of an English walking hat, and interlaced with ribbons. Velvet butterflies are new garnitures.

The Shah is the name of a theatre bonnet in yellow velvet with a huge diamond rosette of black velvet over the eyes and an aigrette in peacock tints rising above. There are cut jet ornaments on the sides and yellow velvet strings coming from behind.

A small toque of sealskin is imported by Mrs. Morton for her daughter. It has a coronet of cut jet about the side crown laid on gray-green ribbon. With it belongs a small flat sealskin muff with bow of gray-green ribbon fastened by jet pins. A toque of sealskin fur shown in Brooklyn has two tails depending in the back and is lavishly trimmed with bows and ends of narrow figured blue ribbon.

A turban bonnet for evening wear which is one of the fruits of Mrs. Morton's shopping for Mrs. McKee, is covered with loose folds of white silk sprayed with gold and silver metal embroidery. There are bands of gray-green velvet above the face with a cluster of white velvet roses, from the midst of which nods a white aigrette.

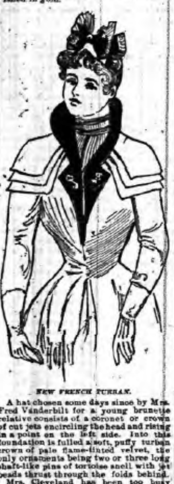
A conspicuously weird dressed blonde who applauded vigorously from a box all the way through Mrs. Vokes' presentation of "Hubby" the other evening, wore a big round hat of a pronounced poke shape which was [illegible] in the new heliotrope shade. The leading color tone bordered by a soft gold red. The side crown was of shaded velvet, the crown and the wide brim of a heavy open work embroidery stiffened on a wire frame. The trimming of ostrich plumes was almost wholly inside, and was fastened by a jet ornament at the left of the face, the curling ends resting on the shoulder, and on the fluffy yellow hair.

A dressy theatre bonnet brought home by Mrs. Frank Leslie is of pale pink corded silk which is laid about the face in soft folds lined with green velvet. Upon the silk runs a delicate creeping vine with small round leaves of a paler green velvet and a stem of silver beads. The crown is open to show the hair, and the garnitures are a green velvet rosette, and an aigrette of pink and green.

Perhaps the leading importer of the city shows as one of his chief d'oeuvres a hat of green velvet with an absolutely flat round crown not bigger than the bottom of a cup meant for after dinner coffee. The brim is composed of side plaitings of velvet, very fine and even, flaring equally all the way round. An earl's coronet in jet—a favorite ornament by the way since the marriage of the Princess Louise—is set upon the crown.

The same milliner keeps in a box protected by soft tissue papers, so that the grand dame whose fancy it captures may think that her eyes are the first to which it has been displayed, a piquant model of inch-wide scarlet velvet ribbon run into the meshes of an open work jet frame, making a lacelike and coquettish structure finished by jet aigrettes and flat bows of scarlet ribbon.

For the beautiful and picturesque Mrs. Ladenburg is a large hat of black velvet with a full puffed velvet brim and a full Tam O'Shanter crown confined about the side crown by a band in Greek fret of wide gold braid. The garnitures are black ribbon bows, over which hover two large black velvet butterflies finished in gold.



NEW FRENCH TURBAN.

A hat chosen some days since by Mrs. Fred Vanderbilt for a young brunette relative consists of a coronet or crown of cut jets encircling the head and rising in a point on the left side. Into this foundation is fulled a soft, puffy turban crown of pale flame-tinted velvet, the only ornaments being two or three long shaft-like pins of tortoise shell with jet beads thrust through the folds behind.

Mrs. Cleveland has been too busy with housefurnishing to do much fall shopping, but she crossed Madison square yesterday in a small close capote of black velvet thickly shirred and with lines of jet beads marking the rows. The crown was covered with jet embroidery, there was a jet coronet to the face and the black lace which made the trimming was jetted heavily.

At a performance of "Shenandoah" the other evening she wore a small black velvet turban with a pale green ribbon bow lying along the front surmounted by black velvet butterflies. The crown was open and partially filled in by a wreath of small pink rosebuds.

We are now at the flood tide of the fall openings and the big dry goods houses are thronged with women. It is wonderful the amount of jet there is to see. The fashionable woman this season will herald her coming with a rattle of beads as merry as set the echoes ringing in the jet craze of two or three years ago. Jet bands, jet coronets, jetted ribbon and jetted lace abound in the millinery. A capote of rose velvet has a double coronet of jet about the face, each coronet surmounted by a butterfly.

Large felt hats in bright colors promise to lend brilliancy to the promenade. An opening day model is a round hat in sulphur yellow felt turned up behind and on the sides. The brim is lined with black velvet edged with a row of large diamond-shaped jet ornaments. The crown is covered with a profusion of black ostrich tips and black ribbons.

In spite of the efforts of the Audubon Society hats and bonnets continue to be perching places for birds. The large blackbirds used in the early autumn reappear in winter millinery. A flat turban of old royal purple velvet has a coronet of jet next the face and a black paroquet on top, with tail projecting forward. A large hat of brown felt has the roll of the brim filled in with small brown and cream birds half the way round. Brown ribbon and ostrich plumes furnish the remaining garniture.

Flowers refuse to give up the fight as against feathers. They are often placed as during the summer inside the hat on the hair. A striking French model is a flaring Directory hat of black felt, the brim of which is cut out in an open work leaf pattern and then embroidered in velvet and silk on the material. The trimming is a black and green double faced satin ribbon—most ribbons which are not brocaded are double faced, by the way—with strings of the same from behind. On one side is a huge bunch of black ostrich feathers. Inside the brim is a large spray of pink roses and foliage.

The variety and elaborate construction of mourning bonnets excites astonishment in the breast of the most hardened. This winter the long widows' veil is to be less used, the nuns' veil acting as its deputy. As a natural consequence fewer crape bonnets are shown, uncut velvet and heavy corded silks holding prominent positions. These bonnets copy every shape and every whim of their gayer sisters, duplicating in dull jet, in dull silk cord embroidery, in black rosettes and aigrettes every millinery effect known.

Young girls' hats are even lower of crown than those of their elders. A hat for Fifine Potter, Mr. James Brown Potter's daughter, is of old rose felt, with shaded old rose and white ostrich feathers laid flat about the brim.

ELLEN OSBORN.

Fashion's Favors.

Unmitigated flatness at the back is a striking feature of the costumes just received from abroad.

The new carmelite wools have silk-woven borders which closely resemble Kensington embroidery.

French washing cheviot is a new material, which is particularly designed for utility gowns and childrens costumes.

Stylish seaside costumes for the first cool days are made of silver gray faced cloth. The trimmings are shaded gray or magnolia white arabesques, or silver galloons.

Genuine green acorns in their tiny cups, and surrounded by shining dark green oak leaves, appear upon some of the large Directoire hats for early autumn wear.

The newest Directoire capes are very full. They are cut round, the small centre at the top fitting the neck, and falling thence in folds around the shoulders.

Black watered silk skirts and bodices, with draperies of Venetian silk net, will be worn during the autumn, the high bodices of the net over V-shaped ones of moire.

A high, wired collar and small hood are effective additions to seal plush mantles, and similar collars of plush or fur are very stylish upon Directoire capes of cloth.

The newest silk blouses for negligee wear are handsome tucked models of crepe and taffetas silk, which fit the figure as closely as a dress bodice, yet have the easy effect of the blouse.

Costumes of laurel green crepeline for early autumn wear are made up in Directoire style, with garnitures of Persian arabesques which show exquisite intermixtures of brilliant colors.

Orange and copper-colored trimmings are the fancy of the hour in London and Paris for diaphanous black toilets, and a great deal of ribbon, both wide and narrow, is used in many fanciful ways.

The refinement which distinguishes the new woolens is also characteristic of the new colors, which are mostly half-shades of green, gray, blue or terra cotta, and exquisite tints of fawn and brown.

Some of the new silken fabrics for demi-dress uses show designs of four o'clocks, dewberry, eglantine, rosemary, iris and honeysuckle blossoms, and are most effective when made up in Empire styles.

Autumn brides wear traveling dresses of Indiana cloth, glace mohair, Turkish melton, bordered English serge or finely woven French camel's hair. They are mostly made up over silk skirts, and trimmed with ornaments and bands of silk cord.

A decided attempt is being made to lengthen the skirts of street costumes. It is hoped that the modistes will cry it down, as if is an untidy and burdensome fashion, and not at all conducive to the health or good nature of the wearers.

Owing to the continued popularity of the blouse, belts are necessary adjuncts of the toilet. Some of the soft leathern belts are very tasteful, and there are some very pretty ones of silk or fine silk stockinette, with silver clasps, and also of white or pale gray kid, with gold and silver clasps.

Fashion has decreed that ladies in London's best society must appear at afternoon teas, lunches, kettledrums and other afternoon entertainments with arms bare, as well as in the evening. The long gloves will be drawn off, and no bracelets will be worn, but the fingers will glitter with costly rings.

An attempt is being made to introduce three-quarter length coats, and Louis Quinze coats of cloth or velvet are shown. These are fitted to the waist, and the fronts slope away to show an elaborate vest, also with revers and Incroyable cravat. These garments are embroidered all over in elaborate patterns.

Short wraps will be worn the coming Winter with dressy street costumes. The models shown are in cape and mantilla shapes, and cloth, shot velvet and seal plush are the materials employed. Many of these garments are mere shoulder capes at the back, not quite reaching the waistline, the fronts being extended to the foot of the skirt, and formed of a breadth of the material folded into three or four large plaits, no other trimming being required.

Autumn tea gowns are modelled after the style of the Egyptian "abaya," and are made of open-work Hindu cloth, with long, flowing sleeves and embroidered yokes. They open over petticoats of silk, which are figured with Indian devices in rich colors, scattered over pale-hued grounds. They are confined loosely at the waist with girdles of silk cords, and slashings at the sides of the skirt show a lining of brilliant Egyptian red.

BECOMING A JEWESS.

How a Young English Bride Renounced the Christian Faith.

The West London Synagogue, in Upper Berkeley street, has been the scene of an unusual event—the marriage of a member of the Hebrew body with a young lady who, until two or three months ago a professing Christian, is now a professing Jewess. Secessions from Protestantism to Roman Catholicism, says the London Standard, are sufficiently numerous to have lost most of the interest which attached to them previously to the great Tractarian or Puseyite movement, which is now, indeed, almost lost sight of in the history of modern ritualism. But there is a decided novelty about a conversion from Christianity to Judaism, and it will be interesting to explain how such an extraordinary change of faith is accomplished. Here is the modus operandi, taken from the lips of a Hebrew gentleman "learned in the law," and well versed in the mysteries of Judaism.

The lady qualifies for admission into the oldest religion in the world by first of all learning Hebrew, coupled with the study of the ethics and creeds of the Jewish cult. The "ethics" are very easily acquired, since they are practically those of the Protestant religion, minus the teachings of the New Testament. The "creeds" are the teachings of the Old Testament, plus those of the Talmud. Having learned these and having acquired a sufficient knowledge of Hebrew to be able to read (a matter of very much greater ease than is generally supposed), the postulant applies to the ministers of the particular synagogue whereof she desires to become a member to examine her in the articles of her new faith. The ministers having duly questioned her on the points above indicated, give her a certificate to the effect that she is qualified for admission to Hebraism. Her next step is to write to the wardens of the synagogue, informing them of what she has done, and requesting to be admitted into the community. In her letter of application she incloses the ministers' certificate of her fitness for membership, and, as a matter of course, the warden's secretary at once replies in writing that she can be and is accordingly admitted into the community. The transformation is complete, and she is one of Judah's fair daughters. The next step is to "engage a seat" at the synagogue, which, until the consent of the wardens has been obtained, would not be allotted to her. Henceforth she enjoys all the rights and privileges of a Jewess to the fullest extent.

THE DRUMMER ABROAD.

How He Receives the Consideration Due an American Citizen.

"I'll tell you what I saw, in Manchester, Eng.," said a Michigander who lately returned from a trip abroad. "On the hotel register I found the name of 'C. Sidney Smith, U. S. A. Ambassador to England and France and S. P. D. to the Czar of Russia.' It was a puzzle to me and I smelt a mouse, but I waited to see him before giving any thing away. After a few hours he called at my room. Then I found him to be an ex-drummer for a Chicago crockery house. He had saved up a few hundred and was making the tour.

"'Why do you assume all these titles?' I asked.

"'Simply to receive the respect and consideration due me,' he replied.

"'Does it cheapen your bills?'

"'No, not to any extent, but it gives me the best for my money, and I have free carriage rides and many invitations out to dine. A man who registers over here as plain Smith or Brown gets only common. I'm off for France next week, and I shall register there as "Special Envoy of the American Congress and Jim Dandy Representative of 70,000,000 Americans." I'll get quail-on toast when you fellows have only bacon. Well, so long. I'm off to dinner with a big manufacturer, and to-morrow I'm to ride out with an M. P. and a Duke. Take my advice and hitch on a title!'"—Detroit Free Press.

INQUISITIVE SELECTMEN.

They Pry Into a Gentleman's Business and Have Their Town Slandered.

A New York astronomer sometime since visited North Adams, Mass., for a vacation and to study the stars. He slept day times and prospected nights. Some of the citizens became alarmed, thinking he might be a New York burglar. At length the Selectmen of the town determined to interview the stranger. The landlord of the hotel objected, saying that he seemed a perfect gentleman, but the Selectmen insisted, and at length he went to the gentleman's room, waked him up, and told him the Selectmen insisted on seeing him. "Show them up," said the gentleman. The Selectmen came up and the Chairman said they would like to know what he was about and why he had come to North Adams. "I have not the slightest objection to tell you," said the gentleman. "The fact is that I committed an offense in New York city and was sentenced by the Court to six months in Sing Sing Prison or two weeks in North Adams. I thought I would rather take North Adams, but having been here a week, have changed my mind and concluded to go back to New York to-morrow and tell them I will take six months in Sing Sing."

DEMOCRATIC TICKET.
FOR GOVERNOR,
LEON ABBETT,
OF HUDSON.

LEON ABBETT.

The possession of certain traits of personal popularity by Leon Abbett, the Democratic candidate for Governor of New Jersey, cannot be truthfully denied, and foremost among them is his great individuality of character and conduct.

He is a brave bold man; a Democrat from conviction and without disguise, and one who will never for the sake of expediency, or any other cause, wear the garb of hypocrisy.

The people like such a man, and because of those who may not be in full accord with his political status, will nevertheless give him their votes, because they admire both his talents and courage.

He fights political battles in a manly way. Not behind money-bag [illegible]works, nor on behalf of aristocratic pretensions and customs, but on the ground of well defined principles and his own inherent ability to make them conducive to the public welfare.

He is of the people, and has ever proven himself to be a reliable advocate of their rights and best interests.

VOTE FOR LEON ABBETT.

BALLOT REFORM.

Prominent among the reforms now urgently called for by the public welfare ranks that of ballot protection, the positive preservation of all elections from the corrupt manipulation of unprincipled politicians and their mercenary [illegible] and abettors.

Ballot Reform has become a crying need, because its purpose is to remove a great and growing political outrage against the character of free institutions and the rights of the people. It is essential for the stability and perpetuity of representative government, and should be pressed into legislative enactment by honest men of all parties.

To be effective, however, Ballot Reform must be real and thorough. No sham measure, plastered over with deception, such as political trickery are wont to fabricate and put forth as genuine, will answer.

The people have been betrayed often enough by artful dodging.

They demand honest and decided action in lieu of hypocritical cant.

To eradicate evil the blows of destruction must be aimed at its cause.

Let every man, rich or poor, high or low, legally entitled to vote, do so and only for such candidates as his own freely exercised judgment approves, and in selecting his ballot and depositing it in the box let him enjoy absolute privacy, and be unwatched and unintimidated by any outside human being of any partisan stripe, completely removed in fact from the influence of depraved partisan politics.

That is the essence of Ballot Reform, and carried into execution, its certain effect would be to dignify citizenship by making voters what they all ought to be and remain, manly, and independent freemen.

Voting is a dignified and responsible duty, a precious prerogative of citizenship, and should be cherished and discharged with rigid fidelity.

The ballot-box was designed to be a pure and emphatic registry of the popular will, and whoever, directly or indirectly, dares pollute that subject of freedom, either by bribery, dishonesty, intimidation, or corrupt methods of any name or kind, is in truth a criminal and ought to be held subject to the penalties of violated law.

Give us Ballot Reform, and so closely enclosed that no door for infringement to creep in can possibly be opened.

How the Democrats Are Fooled Each Year.

(From the Central Press.)

Some persons calling themselves "Republicans" are trying to work up a boom for a "[illegible]" ticket in the next city [illegible] through the columns of the Democratic [illegible] Press. Yes, we recognize the same old [illegible] of a [illegible] ticket that is nearly always put [illegible] [illegible] "citizens' ticket," in the hope of [illegible] a [illegible] Council. No one will be [illegible] by that cry, we take it.

And "we take it" no Democrat will ever be fooled into voting such a ticket again. A "citizens' ticket" in Plainfield has been merely a method of beguiling the Democrats into voting for a lot of striking Republicans who failed in getting a straight nomination by their own party.

A ticket would be made of three and heads and a sprinkling of silly Democrats and labeled "Citizens' Ticket." Republican "supporters," however, would scratch every Democrat off before voting it, while the latter party in perfect simplicity would drop it in the box without a mark.

But the Central Press in its ignorance goes too far. Those who have written THE PRESS on the subject are better Republicans than is the Times; and they are not of the kind who favor a "[illegible] ticket."

A NEWS "SPECIAL."

(From The Press of [illegible].)

Upon the ridiculous information that the daily [illegible] them, the few benighted readers of the same who may yet exist, are probably as [illegible] by this time as [illegible] the paper. Here's another example of ignorance taken from yesterday's issue:

ELIZABETH, N. J., Oct. 16th. Special.—After [illegible] arguments by counsel in the Frazee Lee will case, the case was adjourned until Tuesday, Oct. 29th. The case is being tried before a struck jury.

"The Grand Jury brought in twenty-one [illegible] [illegible], and was discharged [illegible] of the term."

"The regular panel of jurors was discharged until the [illegible] inst., and the court adjourned until Friday, 18th inst."

The Frazee Lee will contest was not adjourned at all, but postponed pending the receipt of a decision of Prerogative Court. The date set down was not the 29th, but the 16th as published in yesterday's PRESS. The case is not being tried before a struck jury, as it is not being tried at all yet.

The Grand Jury was not discharged. It had not completed its labors and meets again.

The regular panel was not discharged until the [illegible] inst., but until the 21st. The Court did not adjourn until Friday the 18th inst. It meets again to-morrow.

A PHILADELPHIA METHOD.

A Newspaper Man From the Quaker City Invades the Home of a Plainfield Lady.

Nowadays there seem to be no privileges of privacy that the newspaper reporter respects. Right into the heart and hearthstone of the family he will force his way, with no sentiment of pity nor consideration for the mother or children.

A reporter of THE PRESS called at the residence of Mrs. John Chandor, of East Fifth street, on Monday, to offer the columns of this paper for any public explanation, denial or defence she might choose to make of the newspaper stories that were being cabled from England regarding her husband. Mrs. Chandor with dignity declined to say a word, and THE PRESS reporter respected the lady's desire to be let alone.

The same day a reporter of the Philadelphia Press called on Mrs. Chandor and was treated in the same modest but firm way. Yet after acknowledging in the Plainfield PRESS office that the lady would not say a word, he went back to Philadelphia and wrote and published the following fake:

There is a neat little frame cottage on East Fifth street, in Plainfield, New Jersey, number 56, about whose occupants many people in Plainfield have wanted for some time to know more than they do. The house is inhabited by a lady and her seven children, the oldest a girl of 15, and the youngest not 3 years old, and about all any one knew was that the lady's name was Mrs. Chandor. Curiosity in Plainfield was stimulated yesterday by the cablegrams in the papers telling that John Arthur Chandor had had Mrs. Bloomfield Moore arrested for criminal libel in London, as a late development of the Hughes-Hallett case.

A reporter of The Press went over to Plainfield yesterday, and had a charming chat with Mrs. Chandor at her home. A trim, English-looking maid answered the summons of the door bell, and with an imperial courtesy said that her mistress was in, and ushered the visitor into a cosy little parlor, where a handsomely framed photograph of Mr. Chandor first strikes the eye. It shows his handsome, jovial face, ornamented with a heavy mustache, while his forehead reaches backward to his crown.

A heavy, hasty step on the stairs and Mrs. Chandor stood at the door. She is apparently about 40 years old.

She said that she had read the newspaper cablegrams of her husband's prosecution of Mrs. Moore and Colonel Hughes-Hallett. "But," she said, with a tremor of the lower lip, "I don't know anything of the trouble between Mr. Chandor and Mrs. Moore, and if I did I would say nothing about it. I have no statement to make for my husband and I certainly have nothing to say of Mrs. Moore. I only knew Mrs. Moore slightly."

"Is it true that Mrs. Moore offered your husband $10,000 a year to manage her estates?" was asked.

"I refuse to say anything about that or the relations between Mrs. Moore and my husband. I came here a year or two ago to find quiet and to educate my children. My husband and myself are now living apart, and I don't want to be mixed up in his troubles. They are now before the court and I suppose everything will come to fight through the courts. I don't know anything about such matters in this country—or in England, either, for that matter—but I suppose everything comes out in the courts."

Mrs. Chandor then "inveighed bitterly against the American love for the scandalous, and immediately followed this with the declaration that London almost lived on scandal. "Why," she exclaimed, with an animated smile, "there is hardly an earl, a duke or a lord in England who has not been in the courts one way or another or has had his name represented there by someone of his family. They seem to live there on scandal in high life."

Mrs. Chandor was told that a cablegram had stated that her husband was credited with being a Philadelphian. Her face flushed with indignation. "I hardly think my husband would feel flattered if he were told that he had been taken for an American," she said slowly. Then she continued with brightly snapping eyes: "You met him in Philadelphia; did he strike you as an American?"

"Not at all; he appeared a thorough Englishman," was the reply.

"Well, I should say so," she assented, with a toss of her head and an expression in which scorn and pride were mutually mixed. She chatted brightly on various topics for some time and gave the impression that she was not an American, no matter how she had it. She spoke contemptuously of everything American and professed ignorance of American customs. The pronunciation of her words are thoroughly American and there is nothing in her personality that indicates the Englishwoman. It is only in her expressed contempt for things American that she is like the impression as to her nationality. Mrs. Chandor holds aloof from everyone and repels every neighborly overture that has been made to her. In doing so, however, she said that she had come to Plainfield for solitude and to take advantage of the superior school facilities offered by the town in the education of her children. Her name is not in this year's directory and she declared yesterday that nobody knew of her name and address but those of the telegraph and post offices. Although living apart from her husband, as she says, there has been no legal separation and he sends monthly remittances for the maintenance of his wife and children. The children attend the public schools in Plainfield, of which there are [illegible] of the best in the State.
